When you come to the Missouri River you find a bridge built across it by this same Union Pacific Railroad Company where you are compelled to pay the enormous rate of $10 for every car passing over it. Whether it be of coal for the poor people on the treeless prairies or of lumber to shelter them, you have to pay $10 a car to get it over, while fifty cents for each passenger is charged. Then you may take your choice of roads from there to Chicago. Over each it is the same. Their earnings are "pooled" and no competition allowed. They hold the commerce of that country in their deadly grasp, and no wonder the effort is made here—I am not surprised at it at all—to prevent the passage of the bill which I have introduced. I am not at all surprised at the display of energy which has been shown for several days past. The lobby has swarmed and the telegraph has been used in a way I have never seen before. The people whom I represent, and in whose interest more particularly I have pressed this bill, have no agents here. I have stood almost alone against all the pressure which by person, letter, or telegraph this combination could bring. Again the company is fortunate in having so able an advocate upon this floor as the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who has from the very inception of this question, from the time I introduced the bill, through the committee and down to this hour, opposed it, and who now seeks to drive it back into the Committee on the Judiciary, from which it was reported. He starts questions and raises objections never suggested even by the company in its arguments.

The Union Pacific Railroad, beyond the question of power, offered but one objection to it. They said "If you want to make this road a branch road, let it be made upon such terms as are just; not compel us to prorate over the mountainous district of our road upon the same terms as upon the valley district." The bill was amended in committee to reach that objection, and that is what the gentleman calls "backing down."

The committee met the company upon their own terms in this particular, and say that prorate shall be upon equal terms as far as Cheyenne, at the foot of the mountains, the grade to that point being but about ten feet to the mile over either road. The proposition is a simple one. Here are two roads built by the munificence of the Government. We ask that they may be made to subserve a public purpose. To-day one practices a monopoly of the grossest kind and one that can only be reached here in the halls of Congress. I had occasion to say in the last Congress, when they were attempting to advance another bill for a national railway, that I feared the introduction of that class of bills.

The experience of the people of Nebraska is not an encouraging one. The Union Pacific Company has even undertaken to run the politics of the State. At our last convention, when the interests of the road were thought to be interested, the unseemly spectacle was presented of Jay Gould and Sydney Dillon being at Omaha in communication with the superintendent of the road, Mr. Clark, at the convention, the wires communicating between them. I repeat, I am not in the interest of or specially hostile to any of these roads, and the attempt of the gentleman to put me in that attitude is a good deal in keeping with the rest of his efforts on behalf of the company he is defending. All I ask is what is right and what is due to the people, no matter which read it benefits or prejudices. The gentleman says the Burlington and Missouri road is not required to prorate the Union Pacific. The very terms of sections 9 and 15 cover that distinctly. But if it is contended that they do not, I have prepared an amendment myself to make that entirely clear, which I shall be only too glad to have incorporated in the bill. It is as follows:

Provided, however, That the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company in Nebraska shall not charge for the transportation of freight and passengers delivered to it at Kearney Junction by the Union Pacific Railroad Company any greater rate than is charged by it for the transportation of other freight and passengers over its own line.

I am entirely willing, and would be glad to have an amendment of that kind adopted in order to cover this point if it is not already covered.

Now, the gentleman proposes another amendment to bring in several other roads. I would be glad to have this done if Congress can do it, but he knows that the right of Congress to interfere with corporations created by the States would be denied by the majority here, and such amendments can only complicate the question before us. The ground upon which this bill is based is that both the Union Pacific and the Burlington and Missouri roads are subsidized by the same act, and in which the power to alter, amend, and repeal is expressly given.

But I regret that my time is exhausted, as I would like to notice more of the gentleman's objections.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I am obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy and ask to have read a telegram received from respectable citizens of Iowa.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA, December 11, 1876.

To Hons. JOHN A. KASSON, ADDISON OLIVER, JAMES WILSON, JOHN Q. TUFTS, GEORGE W. MCCRARY, JAMES W. MCDILL, H. O. PRATT, J. D. AINSWORTH, and Judge SAMPSON:

We believe Burlington and Missouri prorate bill detrimental to interests of Iowa, absolutely suicidal to Northern Central and Western Iowa, and desire a hearing before bill is disposed of.

W. T. SAPP.
MARSHALL KEY.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen are known to me to be among the most prominent and respectable business men resident at Council Bluffs, in Western Iowa. In endeavoring to inquire what they most feared in the bill, I was led to an examination of its provisions such as I had not given before; and it is but due to their character, and also to certain interests in Iowa, that in a moment I state the objections to which, I apprehend, they desire to call my attention.

As the roads now stand—the branches of the Union Pacific—there are four roads crossing Iowa, and meeting at Council Bluffs as the common point at which to deliver to and receive from the Union Pacific Railroad its business. They therefore stand there on equal terms. The southernmost of these roads, known as the Burlington and Missouri road, at whose instance, I suppose, this bill is before this House, constructed by the aid of a special land grant through Nebraska, south of the Union Pacific road, a branch nearly two hundred miles long, tapping far west of all the other roads the main line of the Union Pacific. The object, or rather the result of this bill, for I do not know its object specially, is to give them by its provisions the benefit of the longest haul; first, sacrificing the interests of the Union Pacific for about two hundred miles, which would naturally have the haul to the point of common connection of all the roads; and, secondly, giving them that much advantage in a long haul over the other roads that have met the Union Pacific at the common point of Council Bluffs.

The Burlington and Missouri Railroad and the Rock Island road both run through my district. The Chicago and Northwestern road runs near the north line of my district, in the central portion of the State. The fourth is hardly in a position to compete successfully for the business. I apprehend, therefore, these gentlemen who sent me the dispatch find that this bill tends to establish, and is likely to result in establishing, a monopoly of through business under the name of accommodating the local business of the people of Nebraska.

With a view, therefore, to promote the interests of the people of Nebraska and to see that while justice is done to their rights touching the local traffic other interests shall not be invaded, I desire to offer the following amendment, to be acted upon in its order, and to be considered if the bill is recommitted:

Strike out after the word "discrimination," in line 3, section 2, to the word "for," in line 6, and insert the word "that;" and insert in line 8, after the word "railroad," the words "at or for points on their said line in Nebraska."

Mr. GLOVER. I have no objection to that amendment being considered as pending. But now, in compliance with the generally expressed wish that this bill should be recommitted without further discussion, I move that it be recommitted, with all the pending amendments, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and upon that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask that that committee have leave to report it back at any time.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I object.

Mr. McCRARY. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail. Its adoption will be equivalent to the defeat of the bill, and I am sure the gentleman from Missouri does not desire that.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion for the previous question the motion to recommit is not debatable.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. GLOVER's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 122, noes 32.

So the motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the committee; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of J. T. McGinniss, captain of Thirteenth Infantry United States Army;

The bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac; and

The bill (S. No. 1057) to provide for engraving and printing the portrait of the late Hon. Henry H. Starkweather of Connecticut.

APPOINTMENT ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER appointed the following members to fill vacancies on committees:

Mr. ABBOTT, of Massachusetts, on Public Buildings and Grounds, vice Mr. Ely.

Mr. CARR, of Indiana, on Private Land Claims, vice Mr. Parsons.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, of Elections, vice Mr. BEEBE.

Mr. RIDDLE, of Tennessee, on Invalid Pensions, vice Mr. WILSON.

Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas, on Mileage, vice Mr. Walls.

Mr. HUMPHREYS, of Indiana, of Accounts, vice Mr. Williams.

Mr. FINLEY, of Florida, on Railways and Canals, vice Mr. MEADE.

Mr. FLYE, of Maine, on Railways and Canals, vice Mr. Frost.

Mr. WARNER, of Connecticut, on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, vice Mr. Parsons.

Mr. FRANKLIN, of Missouri, on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, vice Mr. Ely.

Mr. LE MOYNE, of Illinois, on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, vice Mr. MEADE.

Mr. STANTON, of Pennsylvania, on Expenditures in the War Department, vice Mr. CLYMER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, on Rules, vice Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio, on Rules, vice Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. WATTERSON, of Kentucky, of Ways and Means, vice Mr. BLAINE.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, communicating, in pursuance of law, a statement relative to the disbursements of the contingent fund of that Department for the year ending June 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures in the State Department.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DARRALL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for twenty days from the 15th instant.

Mr. SMALLS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days on important business.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the House the bill (H. R. No. 472) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872, and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866, with sundry proposed amendments.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

COINAGE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. At the time the vote was taken to-day on the passage of the bill for the coinage of the silver dollar, I was absent from the Hall of the House; but not from the Capitol. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to record my vote in the affirmative.

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, I desire to call attention to the fact that on yesterday the House ordered that the post-office appropriation bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole and made the special order for to-day after the morning hour. It is manifestly too late in the day now to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. It will go over to to-morrow, holding the same position it does now.

VIRGINIA E. WHITE.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1016, for the relief of Virginia E. White, of Ohio County, West Virginia, and that it now be considered in the House.

Mr. CARR. I object, and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CUTLER: The petition of the Good Templars of Burlington County, New Jersey, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FAULKNER: The petition of Allen C. Hammond for compensation for property taken for public uses, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of G. Chandler, Thomas E. King, and other citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Rear-Admiral R. N. Stembel, United States Navy, to be allowed the pay of a rear-admiral in the United States Navy from the date of his promotion from the rank of commander to that of rear-admiral, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Pattenburgh in the county of Hunterdon to Norton, New Jersey, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Detroit, Sanford County, to Allen's Factory, Marion County, Alabama, to the same committee.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of Lewis Shumate for a rehearing of his claims disallowed by the southern claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania: The petition of David Allen, of Company C, Second United States Artillery, for an appropriation to pay him for services rendered in the office of the Adjutant-General in the year 1873, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of William Darnel, late second lieutenant, Company G, Fourth Tennessee Cavalry, for pay for services from February 1 to August 8, 1863, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of James W. Anderson, executor of the estate of John W. Anderson, of Montgomery County, Maryland, for compensation for timber taken from his lands near Great Falls, on the Potomac River, by United States troops, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 14, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR CAPERTON.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to give notice that on this day a week, next Thursday, the 21st, as soon after the morning hour as will suit the convenience of the Senate, I shall ask that the ordinary business be suspended in order that we may pay the respect due my late colleague, Mr. Caperton.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a Senate resolution of the 8th instant, information in relation to the removal of the Sioux Indians from their treaty reservation to the Indian Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a petition of the Sons of Temperance of Virginia, officially signed, asking for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of the board of trustees of the Girls' Reformed School of the District of Columbia, and other citizens of the District, praying an appropriation for the use of said institution; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Newton, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, and the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY. I present the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Arkansas, officially signed, representing 1,000 members, asking for the same legislation. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of the Methodist church of Allston, Massachusetts, and the petition of the Methodist church of Saxonville, Massachusetts, asking for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of admission to the civil, military, and naval service, and that a constitutional amendment be proposed to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Elizabeth Lucas, praying compensation for property taken and appropriated by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Mary Lucas, praying compensation for property alleged to have been taken and appropriated by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Benjamin F. Brackett, late of Company I, Eighty-seventh Illinois Volunteers, praying to be allowed the difference in the pay between that of a first sergeant and that of a second lieutenant from the 30th day of April, 1863, to the 27th day of July, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FEES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report the resolution which was referred to that committee in reference to the compensation of witnesses summoned before committees, in a new draught.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as amended by the committee will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate, or any of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to suggest to the chairman of the committee, as I suggested the other day, that five cents a mile will not pay the actual necessary traveling expenses of witnesses from the State of Oregon here, and I suggest whether some exception should not be made so as to cover at least the actual expenses.

Mr. DAWES. The committee conferred with the officials in the other branch, and we thought it very desirable to have a uniform rate. It seemed very embarrassing that there should be different rates in the same locality, allowed by different bodies examining witnesses. This is the rate which is established elsewhere, and on consultation with the other members of the committee we all thought it was better to have the same rates. As a general thing I think it would be best that the Government should pay a uniform rate. Perhaps in the case suggested by the Senator from Oregon, it might work a hardship; but it is true in reference to all witnesses summoned before courts, that it is not possible to make it a money-making service on their part, or even to pay their full expenses in all cases. It is generally the case that it is a great hardship to be summoned as a witness before any court, and we should not attempt to establish fees that would in all cases remunerate a man for the loss of his time, or even his expenses. Where the rule would work a very great hardship, we may be compelled to make exceptions. I do not desire to oppose any proper provision as to Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not suppose any Senator would desire to establish a rule that would amount to a money-making business to any witness. I certainly should be very loath to make any suggestion of that kind; but I apprehend at the same time that no Senator would wish and that the Senate as a whole would not wish to establish a rule in reference to the payment of witnesses who are dragged here by subpœnas that would not pay their actual traveling expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the distance from here to Portland, Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. About four thousand miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would make the travel fees two hundred dollars at five cents a mile!

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the price of a ticket?

Mr. MITCHELL. The price of a ticket to San Francisco is about $127 or $130. It is about $45 from there to Portland, and then a man has to pay for sleeping-coaches all the way through and the meals. It averages $3 a day from here to Oregon for meals. I have crossed some seventeen times and I have never been able to get across under $200, and I travel as economically I think as most persons.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire of the Senator what would be the fees of a witness from Oregon under the rule which the committee propose?

Mr. MITCHELL. About $200.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senate should deem it wise to make a different rule or even to make an exception in the case of Oregon witnesses, the committee would not object. The desire of the committee was to put it at as low a figure as would be possible in order to be right and just, and to have a uniformity between the two Houses.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree, certainly, with the chairman of the committee that the rule should be uniform, provided it be a just rule at the same time. I feel, however, that an exception should be made in reference to the whole Pacific coast; it does not apply merely to Oregon. As stated by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] the other day, who is not now in his seat, there should be an exception made in favor of all those States.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps a different rule may be prescribed where a witness is compelled to travel a certain number of miles and there a larger rate of compensation be given. If the Senator can suggest anything of that kind, it would perhaps be acceptable to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would move——

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow the resolution to go over we shall perhaps be able to amend it so that it will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. And let it be printed, so that we may understand what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1077) for the relief of William Bowen, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That James A. Harrold have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate upon leaving copies as required by the rules of the Senate.

PHILIP ROHR.

Mr. JOHNSTON. At the last session the bill (H. R. No. 3503) for the relief of Philip Rohr, of Virginia, for tobacco seized for the use of the Army was referred to the Committee on Claims, and that committee reported adversely on the bill, on the ground of defective evidence. Mr. Rohr has forwarded to me some evidence which supplies the want, as shown by the report of the Committee on Claims. I ask that the case be recommitted to the Committee on Claims with the additional evidence which I now submit.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from Virginia presents additional evidence, and asks that this additional evidence with the original papers may go to the Committee on Claims. He does not ask a reconsideration of the order of the Senate, but that the papers be recommitted, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the papers be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, together with the paper which he now presents. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the resolution of the Committee on Printing in regard to the printing of extra copies of the Louisiana report. I see the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is now in his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which of the two resolutions does the Senator move to take up, the one providing for 1,850 copies or the one providing for 10,000 extra copies?

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call up both; but first I move to proceed to the consideration of the Senate resolution providing for the smaller number.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing yesterday:

Resolved, That 1,850 extra copies of the letter of the President, with the accompanying documents, on the election in Louisiana be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

And that there be printed and stitched or bound with said message the memorial of Messrs. STEVENSON, BOGY, and MCDONALD, and the papers accompanying the same.

Mr. ALLISON. And the testimony?

Mr. THURMAN. If the testimony were here I should certainly expect to put it in. I see by the RECORD that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] said that he expected it would be here by the end of this week. That may be; but it is intimated to me that it is not here because it is needed before some of the investigating committees now in session in New Orleans, and that they requiring its production it cannot be brought here. That has been suggested to me as the reason why it is not here. I would greatly prefer that the printing of these papers should go over until that testimony is here, and that would be doing what is perfectly fair. I cannot understand very well why the printing should be hurried without waiting for that testimony, unless indeed Senators think it will never be produced; but after the statement made the other day by the Senator from Indiana that it would be produced, I do not think it can be assumed that it will not be here and that therefore we are to hurry on with a one-sided and ex parte view of this case. But if the Senate will not wait for that testimony to come in, at least I want the conclusion of the other five gentlemen who were down there to go with the conclusion of my colleague and the four gentlemen who were associated with him. If we cannot have the full measure of justice, the full presentation of the case, as we should have if we had the testimony here, at least we are entitled to have the judgment of these men to be compared with the judgment of my colleague and the four gentlemen who were associated with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I cannot allow the statement made by the gentlemen who represented the democratic party in Louisiana to be published among the official documents of the Senate without making a brief reply, and after I shall have done that I shall have no objection to printing that paper with the documents. But I wish to call attention very briefly, for I will not detain the Senate long in the morning hour, to some points made by these gentlemen in the paper which is now proposed to be incorporated in our public records.

I was very sorry indeed that the signers of this paper did not place the controversy in regard to Louisiana upon the broad grounds of the question of intimidation in the State of Louisiana and the extent to which that intimidation went; but it will be observed by those who have read this paper that they evade that question entirely. They do not take issue at all or to any considerable extent with the report that has already been published, signed by the gentlemen who represented the President of the United States before that board. Their whole paper consists in an array of technicalities to defeat the plain meaning of the law of Louisiana defining the powers of the returning board.

The first point made by them (and I will take care to quote them exactly) is that—

No law exists in Louisiana for the election of electors for President.

If that be true, it is a very remarkable discovery of these gentlemen, for nobody in Louisiana ever found it out. Neither judge, nor lawyer, nor citizen, nor priest, nor layman ever had any doubt about the power or the right of the people of Louisiana to elect electors at the recent election; but these gentlemen have found out that there is no law in Louisiana for that purpose; and that they make the main point of their case. They state that under the law of Louisiana there was no provision made for the election of presidential electors. They ran democratic candidates for electors, and everybody supposed they were in the pursuit of a legal duty. However, this is their principal point. In the very paper itself—and I believe they correctly quote the law—there is this provision of the general law of Louisiana:

SEC. 2824. Every qualified voter in the State shall vote for electors as follows: Two persons shall be selected from the State at large and one person shall be chosen from each congressional district in this State; and in case any ticket shall contain two or more names of persons residing in the same district, (except the two chosen from the State at large,) the first of such names only shall be considered as duly voted for.

This is in the act of 1870. Another section in this code, for it seems to be a code or general law, provides:

SEC. 2830. If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail, from any cause whatever, to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the electors immediately to proceed by ballot to fill such vacancy or vacancies.

Here is a law passed in 1870 that contains the usual provisions contained in the laws of nearly all the States for the election of presidential electors; but they say this law has been repealed, and they find that, by a certain provision attached to a law of 1872 which they quote, the only law providing for the election of electors in Louisiana has been repealed, a discovery made by this committee of democrats. I have here the election law referred to, being an act approved November 20, 1872, which contains this repealing clause, the last section of it:

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

This clause is quoted as a repeal of the provisions made for the election of electors. Mr. President, how these gentlemen could have fallen into that misapprehension I cannot imagine. The law of 1872 contains nothing in it about who shall be elected, whether sheriffs, or coroners, or electors, or representatives, or anything else. It contains a simple provision of the mode and manner of electing all officers in Louisiana, with guards over the purity of the elective franchise, &c.

The title of the bill indicates the object and purpose of the act of 1872: "An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections, to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof, to provide for the election of returning officers and defining their powers and duties, to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives, and to enforce article 103 of the constitution."

That article provides for the purity of elections. It is manifest, therefore, that these gentlemen have taken a very narrow view of this law by their construction when they say that this last clause repeals the whole election laws of Louisiana. If their construction is correct, there is no provision now in Louisiana for the election of any officer of the government of that State. The laws of Louisiana provided, like the laws of other States, for the election of sheriffs, coroners, and a great variety of officers. This law provides the mode and manner in which it shall be done, how the returns shall be made out; and if the argument is good that the law of 1872 repeals the law of 1870, providing for the election of electors, it also repeals all the laws that provide for the election of any officers in the State of Louisiana. So absurd a conclusion as that is not drawn from the law of 1872 except by these gentlemen, so far as I can hear, because all the people in Louisiana were in earnest in supposing that they had the right to elect a whole series of officers, including electors of President of the United States. Upon this point they waste, it seems to me, about a column of their report.

The next point they make is that the returning board could not pass on the election of electors, but it must be done by the governor and others. It seems that by the act of 1870 a returning board of a different character is provided from what is provided by the act of 1872. That provides that—

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

That is, the law of 1870 provides one mode of ascertaining who are elected electors, and the act of 1872 provides an entirely different mode; but they say that if the law of 1870 is not repealed, then this provision about the election board is still in force, and therefore this returning board composed of five men is not the legal election board, but the legal election board consists of the governor and certain other officers. The absurdity of that is very plainly seen when you read the plain language of the act of 1872, which expressly repeals the old returning board and provides a new returning board for all elections in the State of Louisiana. And here is the section that makes that provision, and it is so plain that it seems to me it does not require a very learned lawyer to see the perfect fallacy of the technicality, the narrow basis upon which this part at least of the argument of these gentlemen is based. Here is the law of 1872:

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, &c.

There is a mode pointed out by which it shall be filled. So taking these two acts together, the act of 1870 and the act of 1872, they show clearly that the act of 1872 was intended solely to provide for a new mode of conducting all elections in Louisiana, a new returning board to be organized in a different way, and the machinery of the election is somewhat varied from that provided by the law of 1870. The act of 1872, by any fair construction of it, neither repeals any previous law providing for the number of officers to be elected, their character, their salary, their duties, the nature of their employment—all that mass of laws in Louisiana remains unrepealed; but the act of 1872 substitutes for previous acts regulating the manner of elections a different machinery, so that the act of 1872 does not modify in any particular any law of Louisiana except so far as relates to the manner of conducting the election and the returning board. And yet, sir, strange as it may seem, upon these two points the great body of the labor of these gentlemen has been wasted. They need not have gone to Louisiana to have discovered these provisions of the law. They might have done it in their homes at Chicago. The same points have been raised in the Senate of the United States and have been acted upon and decided against them by committees of this body.

I might say further that the supreme court of the State of Louisiana expressly have decided, in a case which I have in my room, this point, by holding that this returning board, organized under the law of 1872, is the only returning board of the State of Louisiana to pass upon all elections in that State.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt my colleague to ask him what decision he refers to? The only report of a committee on the returning board of Louisiana that I have ever seen yet was Carpenter's report, that the law establishing the returning board of 1872 was a violation of the constitution of that State.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the report I refer to. I refer to the often-quoted report of Messrs. WHEELER, HOAR, and others, who expressly recognize the legality and powers of this returning board; and I also quoted with approbation, as settling the question of the powers and duties of this board, the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana.

Mr. THURMAN. You spoke of Senate reports.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I was wrong. I think our Senate Committee did not pass upon it; but I am not sure. I referred particularly, however, to the House committees.

The next point that these gentlemen waste nearly a column upon is that the board did not fill the vacancy; and, therefore, was not legally constituted. There may be some question as to whether the board ought not to have filled the vacancy; but as to the legal effect of their failure to fill it, I think there ought not to be any question among lawyers. The powers of this board, the quorum of the board, remained precisely the same whether the vacancy was filled or not; and the question of filling the vacancy was a question rather of propriety than a question of legal constitution. That board was legally constituted by the laws of the State of Louisiana, and whether it was composed of four or five men, it had the same legal powers. When a vacancy occurred, it seems to me that vacancy ought to have been filled in the way pointed out by law; but the reason it was not done was given by these returning officers before these gentlemen; and I will do justice to President Wells by giving you in his own language his reasons why this vacancy was not filled. On the sixth day of the session, Colonel Zacharie, who was counsel for the democratic electors, put a question, and this is what occurred:

Colonel ZACHARIE. I would ask if the board will take into consideration the filling of that vacancy, or if they have come to the final consideration of the application?

President WELLS. I have just said that it has not, because it has never had under deliberation the idea that the position would have to be filled. But the board differs in regard to the gentleman you have proposed. I will go further, and state that you gentlemen of the opposite side brought upon us this difficulty. We had a republican on the board and he resigned, and then a democratic legislature filled the vacancy with a democrat, and that democrat resigned. Speaking individually, I don't think you have any claim, therefore, to representation: that you have forfeited it by resignation.

Here was the position. It seems from the statement of one of this returning board that they had offered this position to several democrats, six I believe were named, and that they would not serve, declined to serve. Mr. Arroyo, a democrat, appointed on that board by the democratic legislature, while the board was in process of its business, resigned and declined to serve further.

Mr. WEST. The Senator will pardon me. Mr. Arroyo was put on the board by the remaining members.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Wells says here that he was appointed by a democratic legislature. I think that Mr. Wells was probably more familiar with the facts, and he states here expressly:

We had a republican on the board and he resigned, and then the democratic legislature filled the vacancy with a democrat and that democrat resigned.

It is probable that Mr. Wells, who was on the board, is more likely to be correct; but it makes no difference to my argument.

Mr. THURMAN. Arroyo's resignation was a year ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. More than a year ago; but there has been no election, I believe, since that time and no action by the board until the present occasion. They did make an effort to fill the vacancy, but the same motive that induced Arroyo to resign prevented democrats selected by this board from serving. It was owing to the state of public feeling, and that was the ground on which it was put. At the beginning of this controversy a democratic committee did ask that a certain man, naming him, should be put upon the board, and upon that, according to the statement of Mr. President Wells, they disagreed and the vacancy was not filled.

Now, sir, whether or not it ought not to have been filled, I will not engage in discussing, because if I had been a member of that body I should certainly have been in favor of filling that vacancy by any man who would serve of the democratic party. That a democrat was put upon the board and that he would not serve—whether appointed by the board itself or by the democratic legislature, I do not know—is certain. He may have been appointed by the board and designated by the democratic legislature, but he did not serve, and a kind of public opinion prevented men from serving there who were selected by this board. Finally when they were called upon to name, on the first day of their session, a particular man, they divided and disagreed and did not fill the vacancy. That that goes to the constitution of the board is simply absurd. Sometimes the Supreme Court has been held with less than its usual number by the failure of the President and Senate to perform their constitutional duty. Such a case as that is very common indeed; but it does not affect the jurisdiction of the board or its composition, but is simply a question as to their conduct.

But, sir, another thing is made a good deal of in this report, that the entire clerical force of this board was republican. I do not know any law that required them to employ democratic clerks or, as they call them down there, democratic-conservative clerks, men who perhaps belong to some of these companies that ride around the country. There is no law on the subject. It might have been better there, and it might be better in this country all over, if party spirit was not so high as to require the men holding office generally to surround themselves with men of their own political faith. But it seems to me that this could hardly be made an objection to the constitution of the board, especially when the House of Representatives, the only branch of this Government now in the hands of the democratic party, have been turning out everybody of my faith in politics and putting in democrats, and we do not complain of them for it; they have the right to do it; but I do not suppose any one would say that it is not yet the House of Representatives, that that impairs their power. And it is a little strange that this criticism comes from these gentlemen, all of whom are partisans and two or three of whom are offensively partisan in this particular controversy. They went there as partisans, all partisans, selected by a partisan committee, and they criticise the fact that this returning board did not name a lot of democrats as their assistant clerks. It is a very small hole to creep through in attacking the powers of this board.

Now it is due to Mr. Wells to state that these very questions were presented to the board; and I will read you his answer to them. It was not necessary to send a democratic committee down there to have these questions presented, because they were presented to the board; and here is Governor Wells's answer; I will read the whole of it; and you will see that it covers his view of all these technical points:

The board has considered the protest or objections filed by counsel and has arrived at the following conclusions:

To the first objection, that the act creating the board has the effect of "creating a government not republican in form or character," seems to us to be a political question, that can only be decided by the Congress of the United States.

To the second objection, that this board is vested with judicial power, which is in violation of the constitution: This board is not a court—this board is not a court, but a commission appointed by the Legislature, with special and limited powers; it has no jurisdiction to decide constitutional questions, such as are presented in this protest. If this board be an unconstitutional body, the courts having jurisdiction to pass on this question are open to any person having the right to contest it.

And as Wells said afterward there were no lawyers upon it—

To the third objection, that this board is not legally constituted: The act creating this board provides for the original organization, and it was originally organized as the law directed; all political parties at that time organized or recognized were represented on the board; at that time there was no party known as the democratic-conservative party; there was no provision in the law for a re-organization of the board, so it could not have been contemplated that the board should be changed to suit shifting political organizations that might subsequently be made.

To the fourth objection, that this board should not canvass or count the votes for presidential electors, as there is no law giving this board jurisdiction: The law creating this board says:

"SEC. 2. That this board shall be the returning officers for all elections held in the State."

This seems to us to cover that for the presidential electors so clearly that there is no room for doubt; the objection as to whether the "electors" are State or Federal officers is not material.

I think that is as good an answer as could be made.

To the fifth objection, that this board cannot canvass or count the votes cast for Brewster or Levisee as candidates for presidential electors, for the reason that on the day of the election they were holders of offices of trust or profit of the United States, and were consequently ineligible to the position of electors: This point will be reserved until the evidence shall be produced, merely suggesting that we have doubts as to whether this board can question the eligibility of candidates, our powers being confined to the canvass or compilation of the votes.

I think that this plain man, who boasts that he is not a lawyer, has answered all the points made by this protest; and this document, which is laid on your table and which is now to be printed, is but an amplification of the protest made by the counsel on the part of the democratic electors.

There is one other point made by these gentlemen, that the returning board could not take jurisdiction of a complaint of intimidation unless made by the returning officers within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls or the making and receiving the returns. I have the law here; and this is the same point that was mentioned by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] and in my judgment there is no foundation for it. I will now read the law. It all turns upon the construction of two sections of the act, the twenty-sixth and forty-third sections; and if Senators will mark the connection of these paragraphs they will see that the rule of twenty-four hours applies only to the making up of the consolidated return, and does not apply at all to the forwarding of the accompanying papers, protests, &c. The twenty-sixth section of this act provides for the mode and manner of making out protests and returns by the commissioners of election in each polling place, provides the mode and manner in which it shall be done, and then the forty-third section of the act provides as follows:

It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail.

This clause applies solely to what are called the consolidated returns. The commissioners of elections at the polls send their returns to the supervisor of the parish, and he is bound within twenty-four hours to make a consolidated return of the actual results of these papers from the polls, and he is bound within twenty-four hours to send that consolidated return to the returning board. But the protest and the accompanying affidavits need not then be sent. There is no provision at all that requires it to be done, and I am told that the practice of both parties is that it has not been done. The clause I will now read is another distinct and separate clause of the law, not governed by that clause requiring certain acts to be done within twenty-four hours, but it is as follows, speaking of the duties of the commissioner of registration:

He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

There is no time fixed for that, and the only time that is fixed by a fair construction of the act is that they must be there within ten days so as to be there in time for the action of the returning board; and, as I am told—I know nothing except what is generally admitted there—all parties have acted upon that construction of the law, and both parties at different times have sent in these allegations of intimidation, violence, &c., without respect to the twenty-four hour rule. But even if that rule were to be applied to the papers in this case there is an ample answer to it, because the supervisors of registration when they sent in their reports in most instances attached to them an affidavit that they dared not by reason of danger of their lives attach the formal protest and affidavit to their consolidated return.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question there? He made that statement the other day, and it struck me with so much surprise that I wanted to ask him about it and I will ask him now. If they could not have made the affidavit before they left the parishes, although they could do it and nobody in the world know they had made it except themselves and the officer who administered the oath, how could they make it in New Orleans and go back to their parishes?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will show you the actual fact that they did make them. I do not know why. If my colleague was down there a republican instead of a democrat, in one of these parishes, he would find out what could be done and what could not be done. I do not want to go into all the facts to-day because I propose to do that at some other time. They simply swore that they could not do it, and I believe those statements, and I will read you in a moment the affidavit of one of them to show you the character and condition of the circumstances by which they were surrounded.

The very intimidation which prevented whole masses of people from voting would very easily prevent one man from making an affidavit, especially when he did not feel that he was bound to make his affidavit with his consolidated return. These men did, in some few cases, make the formal protest, but in most cases they personally took their consolidated returns, went to New Orleans, and then attached this formal protest, together with the affidavits of the citizens, to the formal paper, and they were filed before the meeting of the returning board in most cases. That was held to be a compliance with the law.

So far as I know, the attorneys there did not seem to take objection to this construction of the law, but now this committee take objection to it and hold these people to the twenty-four-hour rule, and would deprive whole parishes and large communities of their right to participate in a presidential and State election by an arbitrary twenty-four-hour rule. It seems to me that, in any aspect, whether the rule is a mere directory rule, to be complied with as a general rule, is not material. It is very certain that the mere failure of one of these officers to comply with his duty in sending in that return could not defeat or deprive the people of that parish of their right to vote. I do not believe by any fair construction of the law it was necessary for them to attach their protests to these consolidated returns.

The only other allegation of a matter of fact that these gentlemen assert here struck me as strange; that was:

When the returns were opened by the returning board such returns were found among the papers in a few instances, but not in relation to the parishes of either Ouachita, Morehouse, East Baton Rouge, East or West Feliciana.

And as these are what are called the five bull-dozed parishes, I wish to examine whether or not these gentlemen are correct. I find that in every case of the parishes where they say there were no protests with the returns there are protests and some of them as formal as the keenest Philadelphia lawyer could possibly frame.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the board met?

Mr. SHERMAN. They were there, some of them, before the board met. Now I will refer my colleague to where he will find the proof, and I will take the parishes in their order. As to West Feliciana, he will find on page 186 the formal protest of D. A. Weber, supervisor of registration, and there follow several affidavits, and some of the persons who made these affidavits were afterward examined and cross-examined by both parties; I cannot say that all were. On page 222 my colleague will find the formal affidavit of D. A. Weber, who deposed that he was United States supervisor of election for the parish of West Feliciana. It seems there is a supervisor of election and also supervisor of registration, and both these officers make the formal protest on oath. So much for West Feliciana. Now I will refer to East Feliciana. I find on page 223 of this document a formal protest sworn to on the 10th day of November, 1876, which, if I remember aright, was before the board met at all, and this protest covers over a page of printed matter, of James E. Anderson, setting out in full the details of the intimidation, the nature of it, and the extent of it, sworn to before a judge of the fourth district court of the parish of Orleans. Attached to that is the affidavit of the three witnesses so as to comply literally with the terms of the law; and my colleague will see that these witnesses, whose depositions were attached formally merely to give this board jurisdiction, were afterward examined and cross-examined by both parties; and the testimony of Thomas H. Jenks, which follows on the next page, giving answers to interrogatories on both sides, is here fully set out.

Take the next case, because wherever these gentlemen come down to a matter of fact we can deal with the fact; but where they depend upon questions of law raised before the board and already settled, it is a matter for everybody to determine for himself.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him one moment? I have have not read this report on which he is commenting; but, if I understood from his reading, what they state as matter of fact is that in these five parishes no protest was made within the twenty-four hours. That was their statement. They do not pretend to say that the protests were not coined afterward in the city of New Orleans. That is one of the things they complain of, as I understand. I understand them to say that no protests were made within the twenty-four hours, which, as they construe the law—whether they are right or not I do not know—ought to have been done. Now, my colleague so far has not read one single protest made within the twenty-four hours.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not so understand the clause that I read a moment ago, that these gentlemen confined themselves solely to the twenty-four-hour rule. If they did, then their case is weaker than ever. If there was a law in the State of Louisiana directing the election officer to make a certain return within twenty-four hours, and if he made it within sixty hours, if he failed to make it within the twenty-four hours, that would not defeat the plain right of the people or of the officers elected at that election. It is a directory law. He might be punished, he might be held to account; but it could not defeat the people. I say that by a fair construction of the law there is no such provision requiring this to be done within twenty-four hours; and if there was it would be immaterial. This very affidavit shows you why they did not do it at the time. Mr. Anderson was on all hands held to be a very good man in every respect, a worthy man; no imputation was cast on him. James E. Anderson, supervisor of registration for the parish of East Feliciana, says at the close of his affidavit:

And affiant further states that he did not affix the foregoing statement of riot, intimidation, &c., to his returns of the election at the time of mailing them, because he would have been in danger of his life to have done so at that time.

Here is the affidavit of the officer of this election who makes this return, brings the papers down with him, delivers them on the 10th day of November, and the election was on the 7th, just as rapidly as a man could act. He takes the returns down, makes this affidavit, swears to it, and makes the formal protest, and gives the reason why he did not do it two days before in East Feliciania, that he did not dare to do it there for fear of his life at that time. Here was no delay, no manufactured case. All this occurred before the returns were opened, because this committee did not arrive there until long after the 10th of November.

Now let us go a little further. As to East Baton Rouge, on page 258, there is another formal protest. This is one of the parishes named by these gentlemen as there having been no protest from. There is the protest of the supervisor of election:

F. A. Clover, being duly sworn, &c.

Here is a long deposition connected with other affidavits under the laws, and this witness was afterward examined at length by both parties, and his examination will be found on page 281. It should have been printed directly in connection with his deposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to conclude the remarks I am making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find on page 281 that Francis A. Clover was examined and cross-examined at considerable length, and his deposition is fully set forth. This protest is here in full form. I might go on and show that in Ouachita the protest of M. J. Grady, who was the supervisor of registration or of election, is given in full, printed on page 364; and in Morehouse Parish that of F. M. Grant is printed on page 441. So that in five parishes where these gentlemen say there were no protests there were full protests and formal protests according to the law of Louisiana.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when such is the state of facts disclosed by these gentlemen, the case upon which they rest their report, the whole of it, is upon technicalities. What they say on the main issue of the matter I will read, all the single paragraph they give us in regard to the main facts. What was the question we were sent there to see to? First, whether these men conducted themselves fairly. They do not deny that. The only complaint they make in that particular is one that "the attorneys were not allowed to be present in all cases upon the opening of the returns."

That has been sufficiently explained by showing that the attorneys were allowed to be present in all cases where there was any contest whatever. When there was no contest, no protest, and the returns were agreed upon on all hands, they excluded everybody except about twelve or fifteen persons, the reporters, the two committees, &c., which would make of itself quite a crowd; but whenever there was a contest over a parish all were admitted, the attorneys on both sides, and they came in and examined the papers to their hearts' content. So these gentlemen do not impeach the fairness of the mode of conducting this count.

When you come to the great question, as to the nature of the intimidation that, in the opinion of this board, was sufficient to control and change the result, this is what they say, and I will ask the Clerk to read it:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The evidence taken on both sides, so far as it has been accessible to us, discloses a state of lawlessness in certain parishes, not in the State generally, about the cause of which parties are not agreed. The democrats attribute it to the inefficiency and imbecility of the State government, which they allege to be a usurpation, resting wholly for support on the Federal Army, without the confidence or respect of the people, and without the disposition to prevent or punish crime which they can pervert to political uses. Such a state of things, as might be expected, has led to disorder and, in some instances, to the most shocking barbarities.

The republicans, on the other hand, attribute the lawlessness to the hostility of the white against the colored race and as largely due to politics.

The murders and outrages which have been brought to our notice are frequently committed by persons of the same race upon each other, and in a large majority of cases have no political significance.

Mr. SHERMAN. What these gentlemen do say is true that this intimidation was confined to comparatively few parishes. It was admitted that out of the fifty-seven parishes, in forty there was a free and fair election; but in seventeen parishes there was to a greater or less degree intimidation. As to the character of that intimidation, as to the extent of it, these gentlemen dare not commit themselves, and I say now that when the time shall arrive for the examination of the character of this testimony, I am perfectly willing to stand not only before the Senate of the United States but before any class or part of the people of the United States, upon the broad assertion that in these parishes there was intimidation to a degree and to an extent that actually changed the result of the election—that whole parishes were overawed, the voting population driven into the swamps at night, and murder, riot, tumult, whippings, all sorts of crimes were committed by organized rifle clubs of the democratic party in pursuance of a plan to carry the election, and upon that testimony I would be willing to let this question rest.

Mr. President, in view of the impending importance of this presidential canvass I do not wish to do anything prematurely; I do not wish to debate these facts prematurely. I have made these remarks simply to show the observations of these gentlemen who went there on behalf of the democratic committee contain a bundle of technicalities which have no foundation in the law of Louisiana. I think as Senators and as men we ought to keep our minds self-poised, cool, deliberate, and examine these questions as well as we can. There are three or four States about which there is some controversy. As to the State of South Carolina I understand there is none, because the returns on all hands, it is conceded, show that the Hayes electors were elected, although there is controversy about the State government.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I beg to correct the Senator. I think there is a dispute as to the electoral return of South Carolina and what the votes would declare if properly returned.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a dispute then; but I did not suppose there was any, because the returns made by the very board and by the very court that are now, as I understand, using their process in South Carolina concede the election of the Hayes electors.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is not my understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. In Florida there is a controversy; in Louisiana there is a controversy. As to that controversy in Oregon I can scarcely dignify it by the name of a controversy, because I do not believe any portion of the people of the United States would like to see a President elected by a bold and palpable fraud, by which a man not elected, confessedly not elected, the minority——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at present; I am about through. I do not say and I do not think that that will rise to the dignity of a dispute. Indeed, I saw a remark attributed to the democratic candidate for the Presidency in some of the papers that he himself would scorn to hold his election by virtue of a fraud of that kind. I believe it. I would not believe otherwise. There is some controversy and a real controversy as to Florida and Louisiana; and those cases I am perfectly willing to examine as dispassionately as any man can; but I say to Senators that if they will follow the nature and character of the intimidation and violence that was committed upon poor people, unoffending people in Lousiana, if we can believe the testimony of living witnesses, not negroes alone but officers of the Army, officers of the law, officers of registration, men of the highest character, both white and black, there was a condition of affairs in Louisiana that did change the result in that State. The evidence is overwhelming that but for this intimidation the vote of that State would have been cast for Governor Hayes. I should dislike above all things to see such scenes of intimidation prevail in the election of a President of the United States, or to see any man, however able or eminent he may be, hold the high office of Chief Magistrate of 40,000,000 of people by means such as are depicted in this book.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, one word. "Such as are depicted in this book," which is but one side of the case. When we get the whole case, then we shall see what kind of pictures are presented. But I do not propose now to trench on the matter which is properly before the Senate by replying at all to some of the remarks made by my colleague, although I must confess that I am a little surprised at them and disposed to answer some of them right on the spot; but I do not wish to do that just now; but this matter will be up again and there will be opportunity afforded to see whether there is not another word ending in i-o-n besides the word intimidation, whether there is not a word called exaggeration, and a word too that characterizes, perhaps, the matter in regard to this election as much as it ever was applicable to anything in this world. If positiveness of assertion, boldness of assertion, positive declarations, could settle this matter, I suppose we should have to regard it as settled right here and now at once; but that cannot be. There must be time to examine even this one side of the case before any one is authorized to stand up here and pronounce ex cathedra that the case is thus or the case is so.

This is all I wish to say now, sir. When this matter comes up again I may ask the Senate to hear me further.

Mr. WEST. Cannot we get a vote?

Mr. THURMAN. Not now. I have not yielded the floor. The resolution goes over of course.

Mr. WEST. I do not understand why it goes over. I should like the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. Because the morning hour is out.

Mr. WEST. There is no unfinished business, and this business is just as pertinent as any other.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is before the Senate I shall have something to say now, although I do not wish to speak to-day because the matter requires some little looking into to be able to speak on this subject; and besides the very matter the printing of which I moved is not yet on our tables. Why it is not I do not know. I want the resolution to go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Chair will state that there was no unfinished business before the Senate. This resolution was taken up on the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] at the expiration of the morning business, and is now under consideration by the Senate for its action.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move its postponement until to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is a mere question of printing. I suppose nobody has any objection to printing the small number of copies that the committee have reported, leaving to after-consideration the resolution for printing the larger number. Really, I wish it could be disposed of. The speeches can just as well be made on a dozen occasions that will arise. The subject is before the Senate already in half a dozen forms. It will be a convenience to the Printing Office and an economy to the public service if the extra copies can be ordered now. Congress orders printing by driblets in this way, having the type set up three or four times, and then the Senators who require this delay and additional expense complain of the extravagance of the Printing Office. I wish this resolution could be disposed of now.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope that it will not. The cost of this printing is a small matter compared with having a proper case before the American people. The little cost of printing is too insignificant to be considered upon a subject like this. Here, sir, at the very early part of this session my colleague comes in, or the President sends in, a report made by five gentlemen to him, and immediately it is asked that extra numbers of that President's message and the accompanying report shall be printed with the testimony; that 10,000, and now 11,800 and odd extra copies shall be published, without waiting for the whole testimony to be produced. This was asked without even waiting for the other side to be heard at all in any way, and it has been pressed with a haste that I cannot understand, unless it is the intention to lay before the people of the United States, in order to manufacture public opinion, but one side of this case.

My colleague says that the report of Governor Palmer, Senator Trumbull, Mr. Julian, Mr. Watson, and another gentleman whose name I do not remember at this moment, was made by partisans. If they have manifested more partisanship in this business than my colleague has done—I say it without meaning to be offensive—then I must say that I am no judge of the public acts of men. If they have manifested more partisanship than has been exhibited in other quarters in respect to this, then I am no judge of human action. Why, sir, in the first place, let me say to my colleague, as I said the other day, that the fact that he was requested to go there by the President of the United States, and the additional fact that he is a Senator of the United States, gives him no higher position in this matter than that occupied by any one of the five unofficial gentlemen who went there upon the request of other parties, or went there of their own mere motion. The President of the United States was acting wholly outside of his official duty; I am not condemning him now; but he was acting outside of his official duty when he requested gentlemen to go there at all. In the next place, if he wanted simply to have witnesses there whose report would be satisfactory to the American people and tend to promote peace and acquiescence in the result down there, then it does seem to me that, if there was no partisanship in the business, he might have requested others besides members of his own party to go.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the Senator to tell us what he means exactly when he says the President acted outside of his official duty in requesting these gentlemen to go.

Mr. THURMAN. I say that it was no part of his official duty, imposed on him by the Constitution or by the laws, so far as I know them in my ignorance, to request these gentlemen to go down there and witness that count.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To that I agree; but may I ask my friend whether it was not a part of his official right in obtaining information to request any citizen to obtain information for him respecting any matter of public concern?

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose he may write a letter asking a citizen to witness anything, even the blowing up of Hell Gate, if he sees fit to do it in order to get official information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend has such an invitation.

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose he may do that if he sees fit to do it, and I have not censured him for doing it; but I say there is no constitution, there is no statute that imposes that duty upon him. And there is one very singular thing in connection with this, one thing in which one side of this controversy labors under great disadvantage. The President saw fit to request my colleague, a member of the Senate, to be one of this committee. He saw fit to request three or more very distinguished republican members of the House of Representatives to be members of the committee. They went; they served; and therefore there is in the Senate a champion ready to advocate, as we have seen, with the ability that he possesses and the knowledge of the subject that he possesses, his view of this case; and I dare say in the other House there are three champions ready to do the same thing; but the democratic committee down there, if it can be called democratic—a committee that was composed almost entirely of what are called independent republicans, or were but lately so: Governor Palmer, Senator Trumbull, Mr. Julian, Mr. Watson, (once Assistant Secretary of War during the late civil war,) and Governor Bigler is the only Simon Pure democrat, dyed in the wool, in the whole lot, [laughter,] so far as I know—they have no seat on this floor, they have no seat in the House of Representatives. I should like very well to see occupying a seat in this Senate just now my old friend Senator Trumbull, and hear his reply to the speech just delivered by my colleague. I think he would give some reasons for the faith that was in him that would be worthy of the consideration of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, as I am to speak on this question, as there is a disposition to press it, let me notice one or two things that have been said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask whether three democratic members of this body did not proceed there at somebody's request or voluntarily?

Mr. THURMAN. I can give the Senator a little more history if he wants it. I was requested to go there by somebody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, give all there is; but not what there is not.

Mr. THURMAN. I was requested to go there by somebody; but for the life of me I could not see what business I, a Senator of the United States, had to be there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking about the three Senators who were there.

Mr. THURMAN. I know that some went, and I am not blaming them; I shall not censure them. They saw the matter in a different light from that in which I saw it. I did not think I had any business there, and I did not go. But I was speaking of the fact that of those who did serve on that committee not one has a place in this Senate; not one has a place on the floor of the House of Representatives; and the democratic Senators who did go there did not serve on the committee. Therefore, there is no voice from them such as the voice of my colleague in conducting this discussion on this floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my colleague will allow me to state here that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] and my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] were all there; and, so far from there not having been a member of the House there of the democratic persuasion, we had there the gentleman who has now the honor of being Speaker of the House and several other democratic members of the House, among the rest the gentleman who is now chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and also chairman of the committee that has gone down to investigate Louisiana affairs. I had the pleasure of meeting him in New Orleans. So there was no want of information derived from members of both Houses on the democratic side, if he chooses to consult them. Whether they staid there as long as I did, I do not know. If they came away sooner, they avoided a good deal of hard labor; that was all.

Mr. THURMAN. Nobody has denied that there were democrats down there; and the truth of it is that there were more democrats than anything else in the State of Louisiana and have been for more than six years. There is no question that there were democrats there, plenty of them; but I spoke of that committee that acted for the democratic party in witnessing the transactions of the board.

Now, sir, let us look for a moment at one or two of the questions that have been considered by my colleague; and, first, in respect to the failure to fill up the board. The law was explicit; the law made it their duty to fill up that board, and pray what kind of an excuse does this immaculate Governor Wells give? He says that Arroyo had been appointed and Arroyo resigned, and it was a question whether therefore the democrats had not forfeited their right to have anybody on that board because eighteen months before Arroyo had resigned! One would infer from the speech of my colleague that Arroyo never accepted his appointment at all. According to my recollection Arroyo served on that board until he was so utterly disgusted with its rulings in the celebrated count of January, 1875, that he resigned his position because he would not sign such a report, or, to state it in his own language, he would not be a witness to such wrongs. But does that excuse them for not filling the board? There was the law.

What is the next proposition? Governor Wells, who is no lawyer, has great doubts whether there should have been a democrat appointed, even if they were to proceed to fill the board, because he says when that law passed in 1872 there was no such thing as a democratic party in Louisiana; it was called by some other name; and that is this pure judge; that is this upright man; that is this man upon whose judgment and fairness and integrity we are to rely; that is this man who only looks at the substance of things and disregards quibbles! That is the kind of man! Why, sir, the thing is as bald as it could possibly be. The law is plain enough. They are to be men of different parties; and if there had been an utter dissolution of the democratic party and the formation of some other party, still there is the statute that the board is to be composed of members of different parties. There it is, and they would have been compelled to put on a man of the democratic party there if they had filled that vacancy. Now it will not do for them to say or pretend for one single moment that they could not fill the vacancy. There were 83,000 democratic votes in that State; and to tell me or to tell anybody that out of those 83,000 voters they could not find one man to sit on that board is simply to insult my common sense. They could do it, sir, but they did not intend to do it, for they intended that when they went into that last final session, when there were no committees present, when my colleague was excluded, when Palmer was excluded and everybody but themselves was excluded, then they intended that there should be no democratic eye to see, no democratic ear to hear what they did and what they said. That is the reason of it, sir.

Nor is there any excuse for their not putting on their clerical force some democrat or democrats; but if they had done that, there would have been somebody besides their own partisans to see and to hear what they said and what they did. And yet this thing, so intensely partisan, so intensely unfair, is to be bolstered up by the declarations of my colleague that it is all perfectly right. No, Mr. President, the American people will not take any man's declaration that such a thing, which results in a change of an apparent majority of eight thousand and odd into a minority of three thousand and odd—the American people will not take the assertion of any man, however high he may be and however estimable his character may be, that that is a perfectly fair transaction, unless by an investigation of the facts of the case the American people shall find that that assertion is justified.

But again, my colleague condemns Governor Palmer and his associates as being wrong in law and wrong in fact. He says that wherever they get down to a fact, they are wrong about the fact, and he undertakes to show that that was so in every case by stating that they had asserted that in the five parishes, called by this new-coined word, a compound word, bull-dozed, there were no protests accompanying the returns made out within the time and according to the law of Louisiana. I have not seen the report of Palmer and others. As I said a while ago, it has not been laid on our table, although it was ordered to be printed yesterday morning, I think, was it not?

Mr. KERNAN. The day before yesterday.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not here. I cannot tell why it is not here. I am inclined to think it ought to be here, but I may be mistaken about that. It is not here, and I have not seen it, but as I have understood the position of Palmer and his associates, as read by my colleague, their statement was that within the twenty-four hours and within the parishes there were no such protests; and now every word that my colleague has read corroborates their statement. Every single protest that he has read was made days afterward, and made at the city of New Orleans. What is the excuse? The excuse is that one man has sworn that he could not with safety make the protest in the parish for fear of his life. The returns were given to him. All he had to do was to write his protest and annex it to them, and get the affidavits of three respectable citizens to the same effect. Every officer authorized to administer oaths in those parishes is a republican, I understand, and it was easy to get a republican to administer an oath to a republican certificate. It was easy for them to comply with the law, which required that that thing should be done while the circumstances were fresh in the minds of men. That was easy enough to do, but they did not do it. This poor and miserable excuse that they could not do it for fear of their lives, made by men, I venture to say, who have gone straight back to those parishes, and have been living there in peace ever since, is to my mind one of the most absurd things I ever heard. No, sir; that will not do. I have said that this law about the twenty-four hours in which the protest is to be made is not merely directory as my colleague seems to suppose. If that is the true interpretation of the law, if they can put it off more than twenty-four hours, they can put it off twenty-four days or twenty-four months, if the law postpones the canvassing of the votes that long, according to the interpretation of my colleague. That is not at all the intention of the law. The intention of the law is that the protest shall be made within twenty-four hours, and that the whole package shall then be sealed up and transmitted; not that afterward, days and weeks afterward, elsewhere, hundreds of miles from some of these parishes, protests shall be manufactured according to the exigency of party.

What, asks my colleague, is the importance of the protests being made within twenty-four hours? This board of canvassers have no right to consider whether there has been intimidation or not unless a protest comes up showing a jurisdictional fact. If the protests are made within twenty-four hours then the jurisdiction of the board attaches and it can consider the case. The intimidation is fixed within those twenty-four hours. It is fixed without consultation, without knowing how it is to affect the general result. It is fixed, as it ought to be, without consultation or knowing whether it is necessary to throw this parish or that parish out in order to carry the election for one side or the other. That is the reason, as well as that it ought to be made in view of the facts, that it is required to be made within twenty-four hours; but if you establish that it can be made days afterward, weeks afterward, that it can go to the city of New Orleans, where the board is sitting, and, finding that this parish must be thrown out in order to change the result, then the supervisor can go to work and manufacture a protest—if you allow that, it is simply idle to talk about having any fair count of the votes; and yet that, I understand, is precisely what was done. When they got there they found that these parishes must be thrown out in order to count Tilden out and Hayes in, in order to count Nichols out and Packard in, in order to count this candidate for Congress out and that candidate for Congress in; and then, finding that exigency to exist, these protests are manufactured in the city of New Orleans, and that is said to be according to the law and usage of Louisiana. It is not according to the law, and if it is according to the usage, it is only another proof of how—well, sir, I will not use as strong a term as was on my tongue, but I will say it is another proof of how unrighteous a violation of right and justice the proceedings of Louisiana returning boards are.

I have said all that I can say at this time on the spur of the moment. I did not expect to say one word on this subject, as I had no idea that my colleague was going to make a speech such as he did to go out on the report of Messrs. Palmer and others. I supposed that having made his report, having had it sent in here under the sanction of the President, having his body of testimony here, he would be willing to allow it to go out for the people to judge as far as they could even though that is but a one-sided presentation of the case; but he has seen fit to make an elaborate review of the report of Palmer and his associates, and that, that alone, has compelled me to make the observations which I have submitted to the Senate. As to the merits, as to what this testimony proves, of course I have yet had no time to read it, and if I had had time to read it the other side is not here. I shall do my best to read all I can that is pertinent to the case before I shall be called upon to act in the last and the final resort.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I only wish to say a few words in reply to one or two remarks that have been made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] in regard to the practice of certifying to acts of intimidation in the State of Louisiana by supervisors of election. Whether he correctly interprets the law or not, or whether that law is correctly interpreted by those who practice under it, I think it is well to remember how one side construes the law one day and on another day puts an opposite construction upon it for their own purposes.

In the election of 1872, when the machinery of the election was in the hands of the party to which the honorable Senator belongs, and when the returning board of that State was composed entirely of gentlemen of his political faith, with no republican upon the board as he claims that there should be now a democrat, that board threw out parish after parish, without even a protest from a supervisor, upon affidavits made, as can be quoted from the Carpenter report, in the city of New Orleans eight and ten days after the election. So whatever the republican board has done to-day they have abundant and ample precedent for in the acts of their democratic predecessors, which the Senator from Ohio at that time upheld.

I will submit a proposition to the legal minds of this body, and I should like to have their judgment in the case. I have not seen the report of this committee, but it is alleged, I understand, by them that the act of 1872 repeals all election laws in the State of Louisiana. I ask to be followed to the conclusion that any such opinion leads to. In the first place, the constitution of the State of Louisiana provides that all laws shall express their object in the title. Here is the title of the act that the Senator and the Senator's friends rely upon as having really obliterated all the machinery of the government in the State of Louisiana:

> To regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making returns thereof; to provide for the election of returning officers, and defining their powers and duties; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives; and to enforce article 103 of the constitution.

The concluding section of that law provides—

> That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The democratic theory to-day is that notwithstanding they had an electoral ticket in that State, notwithstanding that they had a ticket for governor and for every office in the State, in consequence of this repealing clause there was no capacity in the people of Louisiana to elect anybody; in other words, that a law providing for the purity of an election, to protect the sanctity of the ballot, should not be exercised because there could be no election under it. It is an absurdity; it is a miserable subterfuge, an after-thought. See what is the conclusion. You provide for the purity of the election, and at the same time provide that you shall not have any election. I rather think that idea is neither good law nor good sense.

That is all I wish to say. I submit that to the gentlemen who made this learned legal report, that on their theory, first we provide that an election shall be pure and in the same law we provide that we shall have no election. That is an absurdity, just like a good many other absurdities and illusions that will be disclosed before this question is concluded.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me for a moment I will state, if that is the idea upon which the Senator from Louisiana expects to convict Governor Palmer, Ex-Senator Trumbull, and others of uttering absurdities, I think he will have a pretty weak case. They say there are elections to which that statute applies. Its title is to preserve the purity of elections. How it works in practice we have seen. It is to preserve the purity of the elections referred to in that statute.

Mr. WEST. In which statute, will the Senator inform me?

Mr. THURMAN. In the election law of Louisiana.

Mr. WEST. They are all revised and placed together, and you cannot reveal one without repealing all.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; I am expressing no opinion at all on the question whether there is a law regulating the election of President and Vice-President. I think it very strange if there is no such law; but then there is plenty for the title of the act to operate upon, whether there is such a law or not. While I am on my feet I wish to ask the Senator one question. Is a man who is a candidate for office eligible to a seat in that returning board and a judge of the returns in his own case?

Mr. WEST. There is no law against it.

Mr. THURMAN. Then you have no law to preserve the purity of elections on that point.

Mr. WEST. We shall hear something further on the question of eligibility of candidates by and by.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I have not had time to read the communication of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and his associates, which it is proposed to print, and I presume no other Senator has had the leisure to do so. There are doubtless questions, and serious ones perhaps, which will arise in the consideration of the return of the electoral vote in Louisiana, and they will at some time come up for consideration before this Congress. I submit to the gentleman from Ohio that he cannot expect that Congress, or this branch of it, will decide such questions on the statement which has been sent in from the gentlemen who went there which it is now proposed to print. This body has sent a committee, a strong and large committee, to investigate and report in reference to the facts which exist there. I assume, therefore, that the question will come up properly when we get their report. The papers tell us that the other House has sent a committee consisting of members of both parties, and they will make a report.

The only suggestion I wish to make is whether it is conducive to the proper and wise solution of this question that day after day, on a mere motion to print, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] should with so much earnestness assure us that the question is all one way. I assure him that there is great difference of opinion among the mass of citizens of the country and, I doubt not, among Senators, and that it will be best, it will be wisest, in reference to the solution of this question ultimately, that we should refrain from reciting or claiming that it was clearly one way or the other until, at least, we shall get the reports of these committees and all the evidence, and be able to examine them. It is not well for the country, it is not well for this body, that these strong assertions, one way or the other, should be made in the absence of these reports and in the absence of an examination into the evidence which the committees will lay before us. I did understand the Senator from Ohio, although I may have misunderstood him, to assert that the proof is all one way. I do not wish to express any opinion, I do not think I ought to do so, but I appeal to Senators that we allow this troublesome question, for troublesome it may be, to wait for discussion until we have the reports of the committees and all that can be brought before us from either side of this case, that we may act upon it. I am sure when every good citizen reflects a moment he will desire that this question shall be treated without heat as much as possible, that it shall be treated after it has been examined and after we have been able to ascertain what the facts are, in the hope that we may decide it aright; and if we do decide it aright then everybody ought to be, and everybody will be, satisfied. It will only make difficulty in deciding it if, in advance of examination and proper discussion on either side, we are asserting and claiming that it is a case beyond doubt one way or the other. I hope the discussion will await that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to prolong this discussion; and the Senator from New York will remember that my observations were solely on the presentation of this document for printing to be ingrafted and made part of the report made to the President.

Mr. KERNAN. I submit that we should wait, and not attempt to controvert one view or the other until we get the whole case before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought that under the circumstances I was not only justified but that it was plainly and manifestly my duty not to let this paper go on the records of the Senate without pointing out the errors and fallacies to which I referred. I thought I did it in a very temperate manner, but I must confess that when I thought about the actual testimony in the case I showed a good deal of feeling, and I think my friend from New York would show the same kind of feeling. I do not wish to go into that at all. I am perfectly willing, when the reports of the Senate and House committees shall be made, to go into this discussion upon the facts; and upon those facts I do not think my mind will ever be changed. Therefore, I have to confess myself a prejudged advocate, because I heard the testimony of the living witnesses, and I read it; and upon the facts as they stand I have not an earthly doubt. As to the law of the case and the points made by these gentlemen in the great body of their argument, I think I can discuss them with coolness and perfect fairness; but I was disappointed in the general tenor and scope of their paper. I did expect them to take up and examine the main question in the case, as to whether intimidation did prevail in Louisiana, according to the testimony submitted to the board, to which they had the same access as I had; and when I found that this paper submitted to the people of the United States now, to decide the presidential election, is based upon technicalities so narrow in their scope, so barren as it seems to me, more like the technicalities that would be submitted to an inferior tribunal, it did appear to me that those facts ought to be pointed out, and that the law they commented upon should be read and the opposite construction given, so that the whole might go to the people of the United States together.

I do not wish to prolong the argument, and will say no more.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will simply add one word to what the Senator from Ohio has said and call attention to the character of this report, which, if rightly considered and looked to, is a confession, is an admission. Here is a report made by a number of gentlemen who went to New Orleans, who were present before the returning board and heard the evidence and, I believe, took part in the argument. They publish an address to the people of the United States after it is all through of some four columns in small type. The great fact before the returning board claimed by the republicans and the great fact before the country was the question of intimidation, of murder, of violence in every form. That was the great, broad, exciting question before the nation upon which the republican party relied, upon which the members of the returning board acted, and that is the great fact upon which the country would want to hear from these democratic gentlemen who went down there. They publish an address of four columns very closely printed, nearly all of which is devoted to mere questions of law, technical difficulties—were the protests filed in twenty-four hours? for example—while the great moving cause, the great question upon which the whole thing must turn—that of intimidation, violence, and fraud—is touched with a single paragraph not as long as your finger, and an attempt is made to ignore it. They could not quite ignore it; they came as near as they could to that; and I want again to call the attention of the Senate to what they say, for after all it is a confession. They did not intend to confess; they did not want to confess; but, as Webster said in the celebrated case in which he made the speech, they were bound to confess and could not help confessing. I will read what they say, and this is all they say on the point, according to my friend from Ohio. I have not read it all, but it is marked as all there is on the subject:

> The evidence taken on both sides, so far as it has been accessible to us, discloses a state of lawlessness in certain parishes, not in the State generally, about the cause of which parties are not agreed.

They admit it does "disclose a state of lawlessness in certain parishes," but the "parties are not agreed" as to the cause of it. Here is the admission of the lawlessness, of the violence. It was dreadful in its character, but they pass over it as lightly as possible:

> The democrats attribute it to the inefficiency and imbecility of the State government, which they allege to be a usurpation.

The democrats attribute it to that. In other words, the democrats admit it, but say that it is the result of the fact that the government was a usurpation; in other words, a government they were not bound to submit to, a government forced upon them, referring to the old Louisiana quarrel—> a usurpation, resting wholly for support on the Federal Army, without the confidence or respect of the people and without the disposition to prevent or punish crime which they can pervert to political uses.

That is the excuse given for it. The violence is admitted by the democrats, but they say it is because the government is a usurpation, going on further to say that the government did not want to punish crime that could be perverted to political uses.

> Such a state of things, as might be expected, has led to disorder and in some instances to the most shocking barbarities.

Certainly the whole country has been horrified at these barbarities. They cannot help admitting them, but they are excused because the democrats say the government is a usurpation.

> The republicans, on the other hand, attribute the lawlessness to the hostility of the white against the colored race and as largely due to politics.

That is putting it very mildly, putting it very briefly.

> The murders and outrages which have been brought to our notice are frequently committed by persons of the same race upon each other, and in a large majority of cases have no political significance.

And with that they dismiss the whole subject of intimidation and murder, and then talk about technical and legal difficulties. Here, in other words, is an attempt to elect a President of the United States by special demurrer, ignoring those crimes that have shocked the nation and, in fact, the world, admitting them, but endeavoring to palliate a little by saying that the government was a usurpation, as if that would justify them in the least! Take that paper all together, reading it broadly, it is an admission that these crimes were committed; they are not denied, but the fact is offset by technical difficulties and the illegality of it.

Mr. WEST. I just want to say that the remark made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] just before he took his seat last would leave the inference that there was a member of the returning board of Louisiana who was a candidate for office.

Mr. THURMAN. I was told by a gentleman that one of them was a candidate for State senator.

Mr. WEST. In order that that case should be correctly stated, that there should be no false impression about it, I will say that General T. C. Anderson was a candidate for the State senate, but before serving upon the board he stated that he did not claim the seat; that he knew that his adversary was elected, and that when the returns were compiled he would not sit upon the board in that case. There was no law that prevented him from doing so if he saw proper, but a proper sense of delicacy and propriety on his part induced him to admit the election of his competitor and refrain from acting upon the board in his own case.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I must say he was a good deal decenter man in that particular respect than two of the returning board in the State of South Carolina who were candidates for State offices and did sit on the returns of their own election.

Mr. WEST. South Carolina is not before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senate wishes to take the vote on this matter and no other Senator desires to speak, I will withdraw the motion to postpone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to insert:

> And that there be also printed and stitched or bound with the same, the memorial of Messrs. McDONALD, BOGY, and STEVENSON on the same subject, with the papers referred to therein.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the words "or bound" should be stricken out, because I understand they will not be bound.

Mr. THURMAN. They will be stitched, and ultimately bound among the documents.

Mr. SHERMAN. This relates to what goes into the executive documents.

Mr. THURMAN. It is in the alternative "stitched or bound."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an objection which has not been urged to the printing of extra copies of this report, at least not to the degree which its importance deserves; and that is that the resolution provides for printing a large, voluminous, and costly document, a portion and certainly the more reliable portion of which must be again reproduced and printed subsequently when the committee which we have raised to examine and report upon that particular subject shall have presented their report. I see no necessity for encountering this double expense, for going through the form of printing this large document, and by the way I would call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Printing to the fact that his report does not comport with the provision of the standing rule of the Senate as found on page 143 of the Manual, which requires that when any additional number of documents shall be required and the printing of which shall be recommended by the Committee on Printing, this recommendation shall be accompanied with an estimate of the probable cost. No such estimate, so far as I have heard, has been submitted with this proposition to print these additional numbers. Taking that fact into consideration and the additional fact that hereafter the same testimony, or substantially the same testimony, must of necessity be printed when the Senate's own committee shall report it in a more authentic form, I shall vote against the proposition to print this additional number.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate has no power to print extra copies of any document to an amount exceeding the cost of $500, and therefore the number is fixed within the $500, as was stated by the Senator from Rhode Island. The number that is provided for by this resolution will cost less than $500; therefore, the number was fixed at 1,850 copies, instead of a large number. If the additional matter that is put on by the amendment of my colleague will increase the cost, it ought to reduce the number so as to come within the limit.

Mr. WITHERS. I was aware of the provision cited by the Senator from Ohio, but I do not see that that takes it out of the provision of the general rule, which is in these terms:

> And when the report shall be in favor of printing additional numbers, it shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was made.

Mr. WITHERS. It was not submitted with the report, if made; at least, not in my hearing.

Mr. ANTHONY. The cost of the first 1,850 copies is within $500. The cost of the 10,000 additional would be $2,500. We have an estimate from the Congressional Printer, we always have an estimate from him in writing. We do not always report the estimate unless some Senator asks the question. I have it not in my desk, but I can get it in a moment if the Senator from Virginia desires it. However, the 1,850 copies come to $500, and the 10,000 copies will come to about $2,500, or very near that sum. Perhaps that is as near an estimate as could be made.

Mr. DAVIS. Under the present resolution, as I understand, the additional number will come within the five-hundred-dollar limit?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; that is the first resolution, and that costs less than $500. It cost 25.9 cents to furnish a copy. It has been already printed. The cost now is the press-work and paper of the additional number, and of course the cost is precisely in proportion to the numbers printed, which is not the case when the type-setting has to be included.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Printing will recollect, I have no doubt, that the Senate has ordered that the memorial or statement of the gentlemen representing the other side of the question be printed and stitched with the present number. That will, of course, add a little to the expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. A mere trifle.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not desire to protract this discussion, although I have yet failed to hear any good reason why this order to print should not have been delayed until the report, I may call it the counter-report, of the committee in opposition to the committee headed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] which I may call the President's committee, should have been laid upon our tables. It is impossible to meet discussion upon the report of this counter-committee unless we know what they have said, and up to this time that is withheld from us, excepting, perhaps, the single copy in a newspaper, perfect or imperfect, which contains the report the Senator from Ohio has used. But there is this reflection——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my friend from Delaware that I read from the only copy I had in the Cincinnati Enquirer. I have no doubt it is printed correctly.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will not understand me as denying the correctness of the report which he read. I only said that there is but a single copy which I know of in the Senate at the moment. I have been very desirous of reading this report. I expected it would, in the ordinary course of public printing, be laid on our tables to-day, but for some reason or other that is not the case. I wish it had been here before the refusal to let it go along with the other accompanying documents had been made.

But there is this reflection, sir, which has occurred to me: This voluminous statement, this collection of ex parte affidavits contains allegations of crimes which, to use the language of the honorable Senator from Ohio, shock the sense of the civilized world. I do not think that his phrase is at all too strong. I believe it is a terrible catalogue of lawlessness and crime sickening in its details and most saddening in its results. But does not that Senator see, and will not the country see, what has been the cause of such a condition of things, and what a mockery it is to term that a government of laws in which such a condition of affairs can become possible? Why, sir, what is the necessary, the logical result in any man's mind when such a document is presented as the history of the domestic and internal affairs of the State of Louisiana—murders alleged by the wholesale, whippings, scourgings, poisonings, all sorts of loathsome and detestable crimes, and this running through a period of nearly two years? What is the question that any man asks of himself when a crime has been committed? It is, how was it punished, or why has it not been punished? Where is the law? Who is the delinquent? "The judge is condemned when the guilty is absolved," is a maxim older than the language in which we speak.

Grant that every word of these affidavits is true, horribly and strictly true, of what a system are such acts the fruit? What governor of a State, what member of any State government in this Union except Louisiana, would have assisted in preparing a compilation which not only attests the wretchedness and misery of his people, but shows his own criminal negligence and failure in his duty to protect them? Who would array this record of their misfortune and his own delinquency for their condemnation and his own defense?

The fact is known to the honorable Senator from Ohio and to every man in the land that the most shocking and cruel murders or murderous assaults were charged under oath against men walking at large in the city of New Orleans, almost within hearing of the charges so made against them, and not an attempt was made to arrest them, not an exercise of authority to bring them to the bar of that law which they were alleged to have transgressed!

It is a strange commentary upon the whole of these proceedings before the New Orleans returning board that notwithstanding the numberless crimes sworn to in their presence no one of the State officials present, or the distinguished witnesses, including the Senator from Ohio, seems to have sought or suggested the arrest of any perpetrator.

Mr. President, can it be that misgoverning officials are to produce this state of affairs and then to take advantage of their own wrong by alleging the results here in order to disfranchise—whom? The victims of their own misgovernment and neglect of duty? Sir, it is preposterous; it is monstrous. The sense of justice of men and women all over this land and all over the civilized world will revolt at it, and will declare that the community which has been made the victim of such atrocious misgovernment, so betrayed by its rulers, and now stained and defiled by the calendar of their guilt, should not be further despoiled of its political liberties.

It is against a rule which has made such crimes possible that the people of Louisiana have in successive elections raised their voices, and on each occasion in vain. The existence of such crimes unpunished by law constitutes one of the evils and misfortunes against which they have faithfully tried by forms of election to relieve themselves, and at each attempt have been ruthlessly thrust down by the unlawful interposition of the executive power of the United States Government.

It seems to me that the effect of this document, properly considered, will be to consign to everlasting shame and infamy those false men into whose treacherous hands the powers of control of that State have been delivered by fraud and by military force, and who never have performed the first duty of honest magistrates or honest government in suppressing crimes which they now parade as a justification for their further outrages upon the liberties of the unhappy people whom they hold in thrall.

I do not think that such an attempt as this, so short-sighted, has ever been presented before. It is not the truth, ghastly and terrible as it is, that I wish to shut out. Let it be fully known; but let it come accompanied by the knowledge that such are the results of congressional interference with local self-government in Louisiana, these are the results of executive military usurpation and of the throttling of the voice of a people who are crying in vain for mercy and for the attempt to liberate themselves from such a shocking condition of affairs. These are unanswerable arguments that truth and justice will deduce from the alleged facts against the continuation of such a state of affairs as culminates in the statement presented by the honorable Senator from Ohio to the Senate of events in the State of Louisiana for the last two years.

What Louisiana now is she has been made by carpet-bag legislation and government, sustained against the entreaties of her taxpaying citizens by the unwarranted intrusion of Federal military power. Shall she be still more cruelly punished because of her misfortunes?

I have said all and perhaps more than I intended to say in regard to this testimony, the source whence it came, the channel through which it was communicated to the Senate. I am far from denying both the power and the duty of the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate, and to both Houses indeed, all facts concerning the condition of the country which he thinks it advisable for them to know. It is in his discretion that they shall be communicated. Their weight is to be decided first by the Senate and House of Representatives; their weight is also to be considered by that honest and intelligent public opinion by which, in the end, all our acts must be judged and by which men and parties in this country must eventually be sustained or, being condemned, must fall.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to reply exactly to the question propounded by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] The cost of printing 10,000 copies—I find I had the memoranda in my desk—is $2,500.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD] has approached a portion of this Louisiana controversy which I think ought to be discussed when fairly presented. I do not know that I ought to discuss it now, although I am somewhat prepared to do so. When I went there I frankly confess that the trouble with me was, after ascertaining the facts, as to the remedy and as to the persons who ought to be chargeable with the grievous nature of things I found there. At first it was very natural to put the question put by the Senator from Delaware, why does not the governor of the State of Louisiana put a stop to these outrages; why does not he, armed with executive power, with the courts mostly republican, put a stop to this lawless murder and violence? That was a question that would be put by every honest man who viewed for the first time the actual spectacle of outrage and wrong among the people there, seeing men in the streets of New Orleans, as I did, who it was said were murderers, guilty of most foul murder. It seemed to me the first inquiry should be, why does not the governor of the State, why do not the authorities of the State seize these men and in some way punish them according to law? Upon that point I am prepared to show statements made by the officers whose duty it is to execute the law, that they have done all that the law allows, all that the law would permit. I can say to you that this day there are in the very hotel where all our committees, both of the Senate and House, meet and where they will hold their sessions, men who are known to have human blood upon their hands and upon their souls, and they walk openly upon the streets, well dressed, like gentlemen. I only repeat what my friend from Delaware has said when I say the question presented itself, why are not those men arrested? I have noticed in the papers within a day or two that two or three men have been arrested, charged with murder, in New Orleans, and taken before the courts; but under the laws there offenders cannot be arrested outside of the parish in which the offense was committed, unless it is shown that criminal proceedings have been commenced in that parish and are pending in that parish. The proceedings to carry a man from New Orleans to the parishes for trial can only be in aid of the constitutional right of every man to be tried in the bailiwick or the place in which the offense was committed; and therefore it is not possible to make these arrests in the city of New Orleans. When you go to the parishes, there the evidence is conclusive that this intimidation has gone to the extent that it is not possible even to hold a court in some of the parishes.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask a question. I have not the law of Louisiana; but is it possible that by the law of Louisiana a person charged with crime cannot be arrested anywhere within the limits of the State? Whether he can be tried out of the vicinity is another question. Is it so that by law a man cannot be arrested anywhere within the boundaries of the State?

Mr. SHERMAN. According to the law of Louisiana, as stated in the newspapers—I have not examined it—there must be a proceeding commenced in the nature of an affidavit or there must be an indictment pending in the parish where it is alleged the crime was committed. I have not examined the law myself; but that is as it is stated in the newspapers.

Now let me go a little further. When this question was put directly to Governor Kellogg and he was told distinctly, "These parishes are presided over by republican officers, and why are not evil-doers brought to justice; why are they not punished?" the answer was endeavored to be made by Governor Kellogg, and I have the materials here for a statement that would carry me far beyond what I intended in this debate, and what I will not embark upon; but it shows that this intimidation in certain portions of Louisiana has gone to such an extent as to overawe the courts, as to disperse the juries, and an actual case is shown here, by testimony of witnesses uncontradicted, that these regulators went inside of a court-house in one of the parishes and there demanded that the jury should be discharged, and it was done and every juryman resigned his office. They then sought to break up the court by the intimidation of the judge. The judge mantained his seat there until finally they intimidated the sheriff and shot him, and he was driven off. Another sheriff was appointed, but he could not perform his duties in that parish, and there has been no court there since. Such is the condition of society in Louisiana, if we can believe the testimony of living witnesses who have not been contradicted. The trouble is, I tell my friend from Delaware, that the white people, the lawless young men of the whites of the South, are determined that the negroes shall not exercise the rights that have been conferred upon them by the people of the United States and by the Constitution of the United States. That is the truth; and they have such power because five men can control a hundred negroes. The negroes, ignorant, uneducated, and accustomed to slavery, will flee from a shadow sometimes, and always from real danger; and a few white men can ride rough-shod over them. There is the trouble, that these white men are now engaged in a conspiracy against the Constitution of the United States, which gives to the negroes the right of suffrage. They will not allow them to exercise the right except in subordination to their will; and in carrying out their purpose they will tread down your law, scatter your courts, shoot your sheriffs, and hold that whole community in absolute terror and intimidation. There is the answer. I have here now proclamations issued by Governor Kellogg, which I saw published in the daily newspapers, plenty of them, offering from one to five thousand dollars reward for the prosecution and conviction of open, known murderers. Here their names are given and the circumstances of the murders. And yet such is the intimidation that no man dare seek to recover that reward, because he knows very well that the making of an affidavit against a well-known citizen of a particular parish would be his own death. That is the explanation of it. Now, there are staring you in the face, in the newspapers published in New Orleans at this moment, advertisements offering high rewards for the detection and punishment of murderers; but they cannot be arrested, and no process can be filed against them by reason of this wholesale intimidation. I could go into these particulars——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator if, after this statement of the turbulent and disorderly condition of Louisiana, he thinks it is proper that the electoral vote of that State should determine who should be President of the whole United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. This condition of intimidation and violence extends wholly to five parishes, and to some extent to seventeen parishes; and if the condition of affairs throughout Louisiana were in the state I have mentioned in all the parishes, I should say with the Senator "No;" but it is localized, and it is confined to one party, though it may be unpleasant for gentlemen to know it; this organized violence is confined to one party. The idea that these white men are afraid of the negroes is absurd. The negroes are a timid, yielding, fleeing race; and when these tumults break out into violence, it is not the white man that is killed except in an isolated case here and there; it is the negro that falls a victim. The purpose is, the object of this whole movement is, not to prevent the election of Hayes so much, or promote the election of Tilden so much as it is to prevent the negro from exercising his right to vote. And yet, strange as it may appear, the Southern States now enjoy thirty-five electoral votes based solely upon the negro vote, based solely upon the negroes living in those Southern States. The white men vote those thirty-five electoral votes, denying to the negro the right to vote except here and there, in places where his vote will not do them any harm; but certainly in those States, where as is admitted by every man, such as Mississippi, and Louisiana, and South Carolina, and Florida, the natural inclinations of the majority would lead them to vote the republican ticket, there the system of terrorism is organized and carried out for the purpose of preventing them from voting.

But, sir, I will not go further into this matter, although I do think that what the Senator from Delaware says is true, that while these things exist there are other questions as to the causes of them and as to the mode of punishing them which he and I have not yet discussed and which ought to be discussed before the American people. I only say now that if I were governor of the State of Louisiana I would put an end to these things or perish in the attempt. I would not allow it to be said of me that I was governor of a people where I could not punish murder, and rioting, and whipping, and violence.

Mr. BAYARD. He is there against their will.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the question. Is he there against their will? Whose will? The southern people down there cannot embrace in their idea that the will of the negroes is to be considered; and there is the secret of the whole matter—their will, the will of the white people is alone to be considered! If their theory is true, that only white people are to be consulted, then the government of Kellogg is a usurpation and a wrong; and that is their idea honestly entertained. I saw plenty of people, talked with them, honest men who really felt that this idea of negro suffrage and negro government was a humiliation and a shame to them, and that Kellogg was the representative of negro government. But, sir, the negro has the right to vote; he has the right to participate in the government. The laws give it, the Constitution gives it to him; and these men endeavoring to deprive this whole class of people in Louisiana of their right originate and organize all this trouble. If the white people alone were to vote in Louisiana, the Kellogg government has no foundation; and it is because the Kellogg government seeks to protect all these people to the extent of its feeble ability in the exercise of the elective franchise that this whole trouble is brought upon us. There is the key of the whole difficulty. It we ought to abandon as an impossibility the idea of carrying into execution in the Southern States the doctrine of negro suffrage; if that, gentlemen, is the ultimatum; if you say that you will not allow these people to vote where their votes would count against you for President; if that is what you mean, then you ought, in all fairness and honor, to surrender that political power which is based upon the negro; and yet that is the sober fact that, in those States where the negro vote could prevail or be made to prevail with the aid of comparatively few white men—as a matter of course we cannot get these States without the aid of the negro vote—the trouble comes from the effort to deprive the negro of his vote.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. In the course of his inquiries there, which seem to have been very widely extended, can the Senator give me any explanation of what seems to be a very remarkable fact, that the negroes are prevented from voting by this terrorism in Louisiana, and yet the same negroes who are thus prevented from voting by bodily fear have no fear of putting themselves on record, signing affidavits to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will read that mass of testimony of the witnesses, or a few of them, and I can give him the names of the witnesses, he will find an explanation of that whole matter. The uniform testimony of the witnesses, white and black, officers of the Army and others, is that the negroes naturally from the necessary course of things, unless prevented from doing so by intimidation, will vote the republican ticket, and the very few cases furnished of affidavits that have been prepared and in print—did you ever see one of those affidavits?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, thousands of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Printed in a formula that a man is called upon to sign.

Mr. WITHERS. Manufactured to order. No difficulty about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was the difficulty with the democratic party in the South. They manufactured, according to the statement of my honorable friend from Virginia, these affidavits, because there were affidavits produced of many negroes written out and printed——

Mr. WITHERS. I beg pardon. I merely meant to convey this idea, that the securing of affidavits to any given statement constituted no difficulty in these southern States; and when we have recorded evidence in the official reports before this body establishing the correctness of this assertion, I do not presume it is necessary to go further. Now, the Senator, it seems to me, begs the whole question in assuming that the negroes must of necessity be republicans, and must of necessity vote the republican ticket unless they are intimidated. If that assertion be admitted and accepted as true, that is an end of the whole proposition and he will have proved his case. It would be unnecessary in that case to have any election in any parish, but only go to the census returns and give the return to the candidate representing the race which was in the majority in that particular parish or county.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think any man who takes an intelligent view of the actual condition of Louisiana can fail to admit in the outset that, by reason of the unhappy divisions there, as a rule the white people vote the democratic ticket and the negroes the republican ticket. It is estimated, according to the best statements there, and I heard both sides, that there are about 7,000 white republicans and there may possibly be half that number of negroes who are democrats by association with their old masters and from ties of affection and who may have voted the democratic ticket voluntarily; but I think that general statement of it is unfortunately true. The mass of the negroes, the great body, nine-tenths of them and more than that proportion, instinctively and naturally vote the republican ticket, and there are good reasons for it.

But the Senator from Virginia asks me if affidavits cannot be manufactured. I am afraid they can be; I fear it may be so. Perhaps it has been done on both sides; I do not know; but I know that we in the performance of what we considered to be a duty (and I think the democratic committee are entitled to the same credit) sought to have this testimony in the form of depositions, and the mass of this testimony is in depositions taken which would be valid evidence in the supreme court of Louisiana in a suit as to the title of the best sugar plantation in that State. The great body of this testimony is in the form of depositions, and wherever an affidavit was material testifying to an important fact, that witness was sent for and submitted to a cross-examination on one side or the other.

There is another unfortunate thing. I do not want to arraign the people of Louisiana; but here is their own registration and it shows this unfortunate condition of affairs, which may probably explain something of the charges of perjury. It happens that there are in the State of Louisiana 384,027 negroes who can neither read nor write. It happens that there are 150,759 white people who cannot read or write. That seems to be most appalling, that only one-tenth of the negroes of Louisiana can read or write, and only a little more than one-half of the whites can read and write! That is rather a staggering fact to a person accustomed to a community where everybody can read and write; and I have no doubt that the condition of society in Louisiana is largely to be attributed to the sad fact that education has not yet grown into life upon the population there, either white or black.

These are the sober facts; you have got to deal with these facts; and in dealing with them you will see that what I state to the Senator from Delaware is true, that while in the first instance the governor and the officers of the State ought to be called upon to explain these outrages, and the failure to punish the perpetrators, yet that failure has been sufficiently accounted for, not so fully as I would like to have it done; but I think I could show the Senator himself by the official papers I have, if I had the time to go into them at length, a pretty full explanation of the inability of the governor, by reason of the state of society in certain parishes there, to enforce the law and punish offenders.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not know but that the picture drawn by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] of the condition of the State of Louisiana under its present government is more hopeless and more dreadful than any fact contained in the terrible catalogue of crimes which he has produced here before the Senate. Sir, in every community there will be found lawless and wicked men; but every community that pretends to be civilized proposes to meet with condign punishment the criminals of every grade within its borders. But here, at the end of some eight years of unquestioned, untrammeled power by officials selected by the party to which the Senator from Ohio belongs, and which he desires to see continued in power, we are told by him that to-day a red-handed murderer cannot be arrested in any part of the State of Louisiana until proceedings by affidavit or indictment have been commenced against him in the parish in which his crime was committed.

Why, Mr. President, I cannot but think the Senator is in error, because he does not aver this of his own knowledge or sustain himself by authority, but refers loosely to newspaper declaration, and that not even produced. In such a statement, I cannot but believe he is in error, and that no such shocking condition of affairs does exist in that State. But, if it does exist, it forms but a still stronger fact to enforce the commentary which I was desiring to make. If it does exist, under whose rule has such a condition of law grown up? Who has had the legislative control of that State? Who have officered that State throughout all its departments, in every grade? Who but the very party that holds it to-day, and for whose continuation the Senator is, as ever, an advocate? What is this admission? That here is a community with what he claims to be an emphatic and positive majority of voters, composed chiefly, almost entirely, of colored men, with a mere scattering handful of whites; they hold every office; they fill and control every branch of the government, executive, judicial, legislative—everything is possessed by them; and yet disorder and crime are the only fruits.

Why, Mr. President, I have always heard that constitutions were made for the protection of minorities. It is supposed that when men are in a majority they can protect themselves; that when you arm them with all the powers of government you have not only given them equality of opportunity, which is the great equality in life, but you have given them even more. In this case we have had again and again the forcible interposition of the strong and the lawless arm of Federal power keeping and forcing those who to-day represent de facto the government of Louisiana in the seats of power which they have held for eight years.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to ask him a question. Perhaps he may not want to answer it at present, but would he be willing to so arm, organize, and discipline the negroes of Louisiana as to enable them to defend themselves against this lawlessness?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I would not treat a black man in Louisiana with any less justice than I would treat a white man there. If I had it in my power he should stand where the law places him, an equal in his rights; but I would not attempt, after I had given him fair and equal opportunity, to eke out his deficiencies of natural capacity or of character by using force to overthrow the law which I have set up for the equal rule of the community. I know that the Senator would not wish to treat me disrespectfully by asking whether I would counsel injustice or illegality. I know he would not ask the question, because it would convey disrespect; but I only say to him that I mean fully what I say.

The laws of the land have given all that human laws can give. They have given to the colored people equality of opportunity. Now, that being given, how are you upon the basis of equal rights to undertake to supply the deficiencies and differences with which the Almighty has seen fit to mark his creatures, both as races and as individuals? We all know that men start in the race of life equipped perhaps with equal opportunities of information; it is so at the bar; it is so in any pursuit; but we start how? We start with the natural gifts which are not created or bestowed by statute law. They did not come from man, and by him they are not to be controlled. You might as well tell me that you could dwarf the intellect of a Webster to the stature of that of some half idiot, and say that because these grand and almost god-like gifts had raised the one to a position of weight where his counsel and thought swayed nations and senates, therefore the weak and the ignorant could, by some poor statute law or amendment to the Constitution, be raised to the level of the gifted and the strong. No, Mr. President, it cannot be and it never will be. All that we can do is to give a fair chance, to give, as I said before, equality of opportunity to the people of this country, to the poor boy equally with the rich man's son, to the black man who comes from his hovel or the rich white man who emerges from his palace. They must take their chances in this battle of life, and if they be deficient and defective, do not suppose that an act of Congress can undertake to remedy the fact. It will not do.

The admission of the honorable Senator is that you have not only given equality to the colored people in Louisiana but you have given them more than equal advantage. You have interfered to overthrow the natural advantages which superior intellect or experience in affairs or wealth may have given to the white inhabitants, once the dominant class in that community. Effort by effort has been made. All have been made in defiance of a principle that I tell you will defeat in the future as it has in the past those who suppose that the affairs of this life can be conducted in disregard of laws higher than those of men, and by statutes which disregard human nature, and every teaching of history and experience.

The shocking fact has been confessed by the Senator from Indiana, that a State equipped with all the forms of law, every office filled with the representatives of a party with whom his sympathy lies, has failed, utterly and hopelessly failed, to produce even the ordinary results of civilized government; that unhappiness, ruin, impoverishment, demoralization, confusion, strife, have all followed in the train of that which has been set up as the government of the State of Louisiana. It seems to me that every consideration that binds men together for a common good would join in condemnation and rejection of a system that had only borne such miserable results.

But there are some proofs of great delinquency which cannot be gotten rid of by alleging, as I said before, inaccurately as I think by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that crimes however monstrous could not be checked by prompt arrest and punishment, unless you should seek the most circumscribed local jurisdiction for the purpose of commencing your proceedings against the criminal. Where else in the civilized world, outside of the State of Louisiana, can it be said that a man charged with murder cannot have the strong hand of the law laid upon his shoulder? Let me show who has created this state of affairs and what has been the history of the government by the present administration of the State of Louisiana.

Beginning on page 1563 of the second volume of the report of the select committee of last summer to inquire into Mississippi affairs, and following up to page 1587, will be found the deposition of E. L. Weber, of the parish of West Feliciana, Louisiana. Mr. Weber states that he is a senator in the Legislature of Louisiana from the twelfth senatorial district, and that he was returned to that office by the joint action of both returning boards in 1873, both by the Warmoth board and by the Kellogg board. He is an active member of the republican party, and, as a member of that party in the Louisiana Legislature, was preparing a report to that Legislature of certain alleged misconduct in parts of Mississippi. He gave his testimony, which is to be found on the pages cited, showing a most disorderly and outrageous condition of affairs in that parish. He was asked who were those who caused this state of affairs and who were the leaders? Among those leaders he described one Colonel Frank Powers. Colonel Powers had been referred to by other witnesses, in other parts of the investigation, as having been a man who would ride over from the border of Louisiana, where he lived, invade the adjoining county of Amite in Mississippi, intimidate the colored men and republicans at the polls, and after creating a riot would ride back to Louisiana. He was stated by many witnesses to be the chief brigand of that district, the head ruffian of the whole affair. At page 1577 Mr. Weber states as follows:

Question. How long have you been acquainted with Frank Powers?
Answer. Since 1870.

Q. You say that he acted with the republican party in 1870, I think you said first?
A. In 1872.
Q. Eighteen hundred and seventy-two, seventy-three, and seventy-four?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he apply through you for office under that party?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What office?
A. Tax-collector of Feliciana.
Q. How often did he apply through you for that office?
A. Quite a number of times.
Q. Did he finally obtain it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When was he appointed?
A. Appointed this spring, I think.
Q. By whom?
A. Governor Kellogg.
Q. Upon whose application and recommendation?
A. Upon our recommendation.
Q. And he holds the office now?
A. Yes, sir.

What is to be said of this case? Here was a citizen of Louisiana, who, if we are to judge by the testimony of some four or five republican witnesses, is the chief leader in all this ruffianism, part of which is described in the bundle of affidavits reported by the Senator from Ohio. If you assail an evil do you look to cure it by striking at the effect or the cause? You might as well tell me that when a man's system is parched with fever you cure it by scraping his tongue, as to tell me that you will cure evils of this kind without removing their real cause. How can ruffianism be abolished? How can law and order and peace be restored in a State when the governor of the State, with the full knowledge of the bad character of such a man as Powers, puts him in a position of high political and pecuniary power?

Why blame those unhappy people when they have not chosen this bad man to rule them, but over whom he has been set up by a governor against whom they have protested and protested in vain for the past five years. Must it not be that this great power which is able to override all law and justice, and to deprive white and black of the right of voting, this power of a State government strong enough within the last fortnight to disfranchise communities by the score and voters by the thousand, and almost the ten thousand, is not strong enough to protect the life, the liberty, and the safety of individuals? It will not do to answer people of common sense and just minds by saying they cannot. That which is so potent for the wrong must surely have some power for the right; but when wickedness and crime are thus placed and kept in power, how can you wonder that crime and wickedness are the results?

Sir, in this case I may trust that I am penetrated by a sense of justice that is not bounded by mere party name or feeling. If I am so biased I am sure that it is without my knowledge; but my sense of justice, the sense of justice that I think is common to every man who hears me, that which I may call the sense of justice of common humanity, must affix the responsibility for these wrongs upon those who have caused them, who have continued them, under whose power and with whose collusion they only could have been permitted to go unchecked and unwhipped of justice.

Statements have been made here, and it is said a great number is contained throughout this large bundle of affidavits, that men could not make affidavit of the facts or the deposition in the place where they lived and where the acts were committed, because their lives would not have been safe if made in that locality. Therefore they were compelled, they say, in disregard of law and under a necessity which knows no law, to go down to New Orleans and, days and perhaps weeks after the occurrence, to make, as lawyers say, nunc pro tunc, the statement which the law required to be made immediately upon the occurrence of the events and on the spot where it occurred. If these affidavits had been made public, and the depositions given in open court orally before a multitude, the allegation might have had some color of truth; but when you recollect that the affidavit was secret, that no one would know the contents of the affidavit but the man who drew it and the man who made it, usually the same person, how frivolous and foolish does such a suggestion appear. But I want against even such suggestions as that to state a broad fact which I believe to be sustained by all the evidence.

Since 1870 we have had sundry committees of investigation into the affairs of the Southern States. Upon every one of those committees, until those at the present session of the Senate, I have been assigned to duty; and therefore I have been present at the taking of numberless depositions, and I have given more than usual attention to the contents of those taken elsewhere; and here I am prepared to say that I never yet have heard, and I do not believe there exists a single case, where a man in any of those States has ever been assaulted or punished for giving testimony which we have made known to the world. If there be such a case it never has yet been presented to my knowledge, and when any proof occurs I will be ready to acknowledge it.

I have heard the statement made that there was testimony they were afraid to give. Afraid to give it! There stand sixteen volumes of testimony taken in 1871, and two more volumes taken about the State of North Carolina in 1870; and then two volumes in relation to Mississippi, amounting to something over 2,000 pages, taken this summer. These witnesses spoke freely. They could not have spoken much more freely. If there was anything left uncharged, really it would be hard to imagine it. There was scarcely a question or subject in regard to which they were not inquired of. If there was any wrong of any kind, personal, political, or social, to the class or individuals, they were invited to state it all; and they certainly stated a great deal, much of which was promptly and categorically denied when we would pin them down to names, dates, and precise facts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I know, if his recollection agrees with mine, he will recall a circumstance which I will mention. I ask him if he does not recollect that on one occasion certainly, and I think more, witnesses asked to be excused from answering questions that were put to them, on the ground of apprehension?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Also that a Mr. Shadd, a colored man living at Vicksburgh, I think, who had been speaker of the house of representatives of Mississippi, desired to be excused from testifying on the ground that he thought his life would be in danger if he came before the committee; and I laid the matter before the committee and he was excused.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That only goes to the fact of apprehension, not of injury.

Mr. BAYARD. I am glad the Senator has mentioned that fact, because whenever a witness, not only in cases of this kind but oftentimes even in civil suits, tells you that his answer will probably involve him in danger, discomfort, or disrepute, or something of that kind, you excuse him from the answer. The witnesses did so say sometimes; there is no doubt about that; and they were never pressed; but here is the question: Witnesses almost by the hundred did not ask for any such exemption, and they told anything, they told everything, they were swift to denounce and reckless in charges; and among the hundreds of those who testified to everything that came into their heads freely, where is the one who has been injured because of his testimony and whose fears of the consequences have ever been realized? Not one. I know some of them have expressed apprehensions. I do not say they did not feel them; but what I mean to say is that their fears were not realized in any single case where the truth, or what they said was the truth, came out openly. I do not desire to impeach the witnesses as a class; I will let the whole testimony do that; but I only mean to say that what I have before asserted is not only I believe perfectly true, thoroughly sustained by the testimony, but it is very pregnant with meaning. If such wholesale and bitter accusations can be made year after year and published with perfect safety throughout scores of volumes of reports, surely violations of election laws can be sworn to in secret without danger to the person who makes this affidavit; so that this professed apprehension and pretended intimidation is disposed of.

This, Mr. President, is about all that I need say at this time. I rose to draw the attention of the Senate as just men, and also the attention of all just men outside of the Senate, to the fact that a community is sought to be condemned for the faults which are expressly and proven to be the faults of those against whose rule they have for years petitioned and protested in vain. It does seem to me that the great heart of the American people will finally be penetrated by this just truth, that you shall not hold a man responsible for evils which you have taken from him the power to prevent; and that this terrible catalogue of alleged crimes, the proofs of misgovernment in this unhappy community, must not be arrayed in vindication of the very men whose default of duty alone could have permitted them to occur.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Delaware seems anxious to force on this collateral question a discussion of the responsibility for the crimes committed in Louisiana. I am glad we have advanced one step in this debate and that these crimes are no longer denied. The honorable Senator from Delaware has stated the nature and character of these offenses as strongly as I could. Indeed, when I made the statement in my way, no stronger than he did in his, I was generally supposed to be unduly heated and excited. Now we have in the outset an admission that there is a state of society in Louisiana which is shocking to humanity and disgraceful to the civilization of our age, a state of society involving murder and all the crimes prohibited by any law, and that without the possibility of punishment. Here we have the sad fact acknowledged. Who commits those crimes? We shall come to the question of punishment hereafter, but who commits these crimes; in whose name are they committed; for what purpose are they committed? It will be impossible for gentlemen to go back of the sober fact that these crimes are committed for political purposes. Notwithstanding the half shade of expression of my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] who went down to New Orleans, he cannot escape the fact that they are for political purposes; that they are mainly committed by white men to obtain political power; and that the reason why they cannot be punished is because they are above the law.

These are sober facts; and here I will cite a single instance, although I shall not go further into the testimony to show them. I have the report here of a judge where there was an effort made to bring to punishment the murderers of a man by the name of Gair, a most atrocious murder, which was committed, I believe, in East Feliciana Parish some time last fall.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him if the murder of Gair was in any sense political?

Mr. SHERMAN. The testimony shows it. The statement of the Gair case would be an episode in itself; it would be a tragic episode with the circumstances which led to the murder of Gair and all the surroundings. It is one of the strangest stories that I ever read in my life. I will not stop now to read it, because I wish Senators to read it in the language of the judge. At any rate an attempt was made to punish those who had murdered Gair and who had murdered a woman also, and here is the statement. I read from the report:

The regular term of court commenced a few weeks afterward. The State authorities determined that, if possible, these crimes should be thoroughly investigated. What followed is stated in the official report of the judge, which is here subjoined:

NEW ORLEANS, October 15, 1875.

Hon. C. C. ANTOINE,
Acting Governor of the State of Louisiana.

SIR: Agreeably to your request by telegraph I have the honor to submit the following statement connected with the opening and adjournment of the fifth judicial district court in and for the parish of East Feliciana.

The court opened at ten a. m., October 7, the sheriff, Henry Smith, in attendance. The grand jury was impaneled, charged by the court, and returned to their room with the district attorney, A. E. Read, esq. The civil and criminal dockets were then called and cases assigned.

An appeal case from the parish court was taken up, and the trial proceeding, when the sheriff came into the court-room and in a loud voice, attracting the attention of the court, seemed to be wrangling with some person in the passage leading to the court-room. I directed him to keep order, as the controversy in which he was engaged interrupted the proceedings of the court. He came within the bar and sat down. I then saw several persons in the doorway smoking, with their hats on. I directed the sheriff to request them to take seats within the court-room or to cease smoking and take their hats off. They withdrew from the door into the passage, beyond the view of the court, the sheriff returning within the bar.

The case on trial proceeded, and hearing a disturbance in the passage-way, I called D. C. Hardee, esq., to the bench, and said to him, we must have order or the court cannot go on. He replied that from the appearance of the crowd he saw about the court-house he thought it doubtful whether Smith could keep order; that they were persons not to be trifled with. I rejoined, you know better whether he can control them or not. He then asked me if I was not aware of the opposition to Henry Smith. I replied that I had seen reports in the newspapers, but could not believe they were true. While this conversation was going on, the sheriff left the court room without my knowledge, and, as I was afterward informed and believe, while near the foot of the stairs was set upon by the same persons with whom he was previously disputing. He then ran into the court-house yard, and while there was fired upon by the crowd. I should think twenty pistol shots were fired. I heard some one remark in the court-room that they were shooting at Smith. Including the members of the bar, about twenty persons were then in the court-room. Looking into the court-yard, I saw Henry Smith limping, and an excited crowd talking to him. A consultation took place between several members of the bar, citizens, and myself; some advised that the court adjourn sine die, some an adjournment for a few days, others stating that with Smith as sheriff it was impossible for the court to proceed. One gentleman gave as a reason why the court should adjourn sine die, that if word should go into the country that Smith had been shot, both whites and colored would flock into town, and a conflict would be inevitable; word of adjournment would stop them.

Then he goes on and gave the reason for an adjournment.

Mr. EATON. Will the honorable Senator give the date of that letter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did give the date. It is some time in October.

Mr. EATON. When?

Mr. SHERMAN. Last year, October, 1875.

Mr. EATON. Eighteen hundred and seventy-five?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give you a case later in a moment. Smith was removed by Kellogg on account of the popular excitement and thereupon he appointed a democrat, for I have no doubt Kellogg has been sometimes compelled to appoint democrats:

It was represented that the opposition to Sheriff Smith in East Feliciana was because he was a colored man and ignorant. Governor Kellogg obtained Smith's resignation (he had been elected to his office by a large majority)—

He was not appointed by Kellogg at all. He was elected—and appointed in his place Dr. J. R. Monahan, an old and respected white citizen of the parish, hoping thereby to secure the enforcement of the laws. But matters simply went from bad to worse.

The result is that there has been no court held there; the judge cannot hold his court. Here I have another statement which I will read, which is of a later date, the statement of a parish judge.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] to say that the Gair case was not a political murder.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say I think it was a political murder.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think it was not, and I think I can state that upon the authority of Kellogg himself. The subject was discussed before him. I think it grew out of the poisoning by a black woman of a certain family in some parish in Louisiana, and being taken up she acknowledged the fact that Gair had induced her to poison the family; and in the indignation of the moment he was seized, as I understood, by a party of people from Mississippi; but from where it matters not. It grew out of that affair as I was informed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope I shall not be further interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed without interruption.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not going into these collateral questions, and I do not want to be interrupted. Whether the murder was political or not it is enough for my argument to state the fact that it occurred. My understanding is that Gair was murdered for his politics, and the testimony taken will show that to be the case. The cases of Gair and Pinkston are marked cases, and I think they were both political murders. I have no doubt my friend from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] could at once tell me. I will cite another case to show that this organized intimidation extends not merely to the poor negro, but that it goes to the fountain of justice.

STATEMENT OF JOHN S. DULA.

I am parish judge of my parish, (parish of West Feliciana.) For the last year there has been an organized band of white democrats, styling themselves bull-dozers and regulators, who patrolled the entire, and, by threats, acts of violence, and burning houses, have intimidated the colored people to such an extent that few have the hardihood to openly declare themselves republicans. These parties I have seen, and speak of what I know. About a year ago, about the 25th of October, 1875, about three hundred regulators, all armed with shot-guns, rifles, and pistols, who I was notified came to demand my resignation as parish judge. About eight o'clock I shut my store and went to the residence of a friend, and shortly afterward they broke into my store, gutted it, and left with a colored man, an acquaintance of mine, a resignation to the governor of my office of judge, and left word that unless I resigned it by the next day at four o'clock they would take my life. I sent them a refusal, and took boat for the city of New Orleans, where I remained for three months. I then returned, and after heard it remarked that the damned radical officials must leave the parish if they value their lives. For the three months just before the election the parish has been patrolled by the bull-dozers. About the 1st of May last—

Here is the particular case to which I wish to call attention—

About the 1st of May, 1876, about fifty or sixty armed democrats rushed into the court-house where I was holding court, and the republican members of the police jury were summoned and commanded to resign at once on pain of death, which they did. There has been several murders within the last three months, one of whom, Isaac Mitchell, a prominent republican, but who was an inoffensive man, and who held no official position, who owned his own farm and worked it, and who attended to his own business, but who refused openly to join the democratic clubs and rebuked colored men who did so.

He afterward goes on to state the murder of Mitchell. Here was a case of a parish judge against whom there was no hostility and who, while pursuing his ordinary duties, was driven from his court. I do not want to go into details. We have got down now to the main facts, and I wish to impress them upon the Senate and the country. First, the degree of crime, offense, and wrong in Louisiana is substantially admitted. That is what is meant by the legal phrase "intimidation." Next, the question is, who is responsible? That is the question put us by the Senator from Delaware. I say distinctly that it is the unlawful conduct of white democratic clubs. There may be here and there instances of violence and murder on other accounts; there may have been murder for other reasons; but had it not been for the overriding power of these democratic clubs, who go armed by night and by day, driving unoffending negroes from their cabins, there would soon be peace there, because there would be an instinct of self-preservation which would make the property-holders rise and put down these disturbances; but when this organization is for political ends and for political purposes, it overawes the whole white population, and the negro population is powerless. These crimes are committed for political purposes. That is my answer. What is the remedy? There is one remedy, it may be; that is the remedy of the Senator from Delaware. He wants these negroes to knuckle down, to surrender their elective franchise, because that is the effect of it.

Mr. BAYARD. I beg the Senator's pardon; does he say "the remedy of the Senator from Delaware?"

Mr. SHERMAN. I say I think that is the result of your remedy.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the Senator referring to anything I said?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I say the result of the remedy proposed by the Senator from Delaware would be the practical subjection of the negroes to the white race, and I am going on to explain it. His idea is that white men are better, stronger, and have a higher intelligence. They will exercise their due influence undoubtedly. The white men of the South will naturally in the course of time rule in the Southern States, perhaps in all of them; but what I object to is that they should gain that rule by intimidation and lawless acts. If they can win the negroes to their side, even to vote the democratic ticket, let them do it; it is their right. If their intelligence and wealth enable them to do it, we cannot object; but that is not the cause of what we witness in Louisiana.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator just there, is there anything that fell from me in this debate or anything ever known by him of me, privately or publicly, that would make him believe or justify him in stating that I desired that any man in this land should be ruled by intimidation and violence?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I did not state that. My friend is too sensitive entirely. I say that the result of his policy and the result of his ideas would be to subject the black man to the absolute control of the white man. There are three modes of dealing with this question, and the time is coming when we have got to look to it, either during this or the next administration. You may allow these lawless acts of violence to have their natural effect of overawing and intimidating the black race, and thus give to the slave-holders, or those who were slave-holders, increased political power to be exercised by means of these freedmen and through the votes of these freedmen. If so, you will have peace. Let the black men knuckle down and vote the democratic ticket, and you will have peace; but is that the kind of peace we want in this country? Suppose that the natives of this country, who are in the majority, should say to the naturalized citizens, "You have no right to vote in this country; you have no right to rule; you were not born here; we will ride over you rough-shod;" would you like to see the natives successful upon such a proposition? No; the instincts of humanity would be at once for natives as well as naturalized citizens, to resist such an attempt. That is the condition of society in the South, and especially in Louisiana, and I only wish to deal with Louisiana now. The leaders there are organized with the intention of preventing the negroes from exercising the elective franchise. They intend to do it if possible by coaxing, if necessary by throwing them out of work, and, if that is not effective, by whipping an occasional negro, driving them out from their cabins, and if the worst comes, murder. There is the fact. Is it wise, is it good for the people of this country that this policy should prevail? Down there they call it "the Mississippi policy." They all speak of it as "the Mississippi policy." It came originally, I believe, from Georgia. It is said to have come from Georgia; but, wherever it came from, the effect has been to overawe and keep down the negro vote, and that is the purpose in Louisiana. Now, gentlemen, I say it is not best for the people of this country, it is not best for the Senate, it is not best for any State that this should be the case. If you can win the votes of the negroes, whom you must in the main employ, whose labor is the foundation of your wealth and prosperity, the ancestors of whom lived for generations as your slaves—if you can win them by kindness, God speed, win them; but when you overawe them as you have done in the Southern States, especially in Louisiana, when you seek by violence to intimidate and control them, then you have prescribed a remedy which strikes at the very foundation of our Government. It is a remedy worse than the disease, and I tell you that if it succeeds in this instance in electing a President of the United States, these same scenes of violence now practiced upon the poor negroes, the same degree of intimidation which now holds them as slaves, will extend gradually all over the United States of America and our Government will be at an end. If you once show a successful attempt at this policy, a successful enforcement of it by the election of a President of the United States through force and violence, through intimidation and threats, you destroy the fair fabric of our Government founded upon the blood and achievements of our ancestors and there is an end of republican government. That is "the Mississippi policy," and that policy has been in force in Louisiana. I do not care who he is that has been there, he cannot deny it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me just now. I should be very glad to yield, but I prefer to go on.

Mr. President, that is the condition of affairs there. I say no one will fairly look at the condition of affairs in Louisiana who will not admit the facts. We hear talk about the remedy. I say the remedy which has been proposed to cure the evils of the State government of Louisiana (I may admit that they are many) is worse than the disease. If these white people had come forward in the exercise of the elective franchise and sought to gain the favor of the blacks by quiet means, and they had divided off between the republicans and the democrats, made new issues, any issues whatever, and gained political favor, I should have no objection; but the means they have resorted to is like the gangrene, which spreading inch by inch will destroy the whole body-politic. Therefore we dare not if we would and we would not if we could allow this system of intimidation to prevail. It is not best for us nor for those who are to come after us that the example should now be set, in this centennial year of 1876, of large communities being overawed by intimidation and their votes so cast as to control the election of a President of the United States. Whether Hayes or Tilden is elected is comparatively of little importance. Neither of them can so guide this great country of ours as to turn it from its course. Neither of them as President could exercise such influence as greatly to injure our country; but the result of an election by violence, controlled and overawed by fear, even upon the humblest and weakest of our citizens, is far worse than the election of Mr. Tilden or the restoration of the democratic party to power can be.

There are other remedies, but I do not like to discuss them. If you choose to withdraw and to turn over to the white people there the utter control of this matter and leave the blacks of Louisiana in the same condition that the blacks in Mississippi are, there is the success of the democratic policy. On the other hand, there is another way. We can teach the negroes that they have an inherent right of self-defense. By the law of most of the Southern States—I am informed by the Senator from Tennessee that by the law of Tennessee it is so—any man, black or white, can shoot down these lawless bands that are parading around his home at night; it is justifiable homicide. I am told this is the law in several of the Southern States. Such a thing could not exist in Ohio. If a band of republicans in the strongest republican community anywhere in Ohio should go around and molest or overawe the weakest democrat in the land the whole country would be in arms. It could not occur in Ohio; it should not occur in Louisiana. The law of self-defense can correct it. The negro might soon be taught, especially in those parishes where there are three black men to one white man, that he has the right of self-defense; but who wishes to even suggest or intimate or anticipate such horrors? Who wishes to see a war of races? Yet rather than see what has occurred in Louisiana these men will learn, not from you and me, not from our teaching, but by the instinct planted by Almighty God, that they can resist these outrages; that the negro can defend his cabin, his wife, his children from these outrages; and that he will be justified by the laws of God and man in repelling these assaults, whether they come by day or by night. I do not want to see this done; I fear it; and yet it will come, whatever policy may direct in this country, unless you give to the negroes the rights which are secured to them by the Constitution of the United States.

Another remedy is beyond our reach. A great many cautious and prudent men have feared that they went too far in the passage of the fifteenth amendment; that while this was a barren gift to the negro it has been a bounteous gift to the men who waged war against us; that we have given them thirty-five electoral votes upon condition that the negro should have suffrage, and now they keep the votes and deny the suffrage. That cannot last long. You may win one presidential election upon it, you cannot go further. The instinct of justice, which is implanted deeper than party lines, deeper than sectional lines, will correct this evil before many years roll around, not by revolution, not by bloodshed, but by the strong arm of the popular will, on account of this glaring injustice, made prominent in this presidential canvass, that the men who sought to overthrow the Government, having gained political power, then refuse to give the negroes, upon whose heads and shoulders this power was granted, for whom it was granted, the right to vote, but intimidate them, whip them, kill them occasionally, and terrorize them. It will not do.

These remedies I did not wish to discuss. My friend from Delaware has drawn me into it, and I say now again that the democratic policy does only magnify the evils under which we labor. Kellogg may not have been a good governor, but I do not admit that. He certainly has been unable to put down this violence and wrong. He gives the best reasons he can for his failure to do it, and I think they are good reasons. I do not think he ought to be condemned in advance. The Senator from Delaware himself said in regard to Governor Grover that we ought not to too hastily denounce or criticise the action of so high an officer of a State government; but no such charity has been extended to Kellogg, although he was once a member of this body. His disability there with the whites against him has never been considered with charity. I am not here as his advocate or defender. I am afraid that I ought not myself to be trusted with the power of a governor of the State of Louisiana, for there would be something either cured or made worse in that community.

Sir, the real trouble in this whole matter is the political attempt made in the midst of a presidential election to organize a party upon the color line to ride rough-shod over those who naturally vote the republican ticket, so organized as to be confined to but a few republican parishes, and with the design and purpose of making a man President of the United States who is not elected by the free choice of the American people. This ought not to be, and I believe the sober sense, the candid judgment, the quiet consideration of the people of the United States will not have it so. Not that I anticipate war, or trouble, or bloodshed, but I do believe that the mind of the people of the United States, North and South, is daily going forward to the determination that this thing ought not to be allowed to be consummated by the triumph of the democratic rifle clubs in the State of Louisiana. The remedy will come of itself. All that is needed is a wise, considerate, and just rule in these Southern States. I see no difficulty outside of this. There are no questions arising in the Southern States growing out of the late war. There is no reason why the Southern States and the Northern States should not now be organized upon a basis entirely distinct from the questions of the war, from the questions of slavery, but the only solid basis is equal and impartial suffrage freely yielded, with protection to all, white and black, in their rights and punishment against offenders; and unless you yield that you will be in constant turmoil and trouble; the South cannot revive her drooping industries, she cannot recover her losses by the war. Men who would naturally go to her and mingle their blood with hers and add their labor to hers will never go there with these scenes of outrage continually ding-donged upon their minds and proven by living witnesses. You cannot have that mingling of blood between the North and the South necessary to make a great and a free people; you cannot make it homogeneous under such a condition of things. There is nothing in the condition of society in the South except this one question of race that ought to keep us asunder a moment. Take away the prejudices and jealousies that grow out of this race question and we would mingle, and mingle cheerfully and kindly and happily together. All the political questions of the future that are likely to arise will arise upon other issues than this question if only the South will stop this intimidation, allow these negroes their rights, win them by kindness if they will, and secure them in their rights and protect them against lawless violence. I do believe that under a wise policy, with an administration that will be firm in maintaining the rights of the blacks as well as be generous to the whites, all the clouds that are now lowering upon our house will pass away and be

In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, in this running debate on Louisiana affairs I find myself compelled to continually interject remarks in reply to Senators who either are not informed in regard to the subjects on which they treat, or view matters differently from what I do and from what I think the Senate ought to view them. The question was asked here a few moments ago by the Senator from Delaware why it was, if such a state of intimidation and outrage existed in these parishes, that the witnesses who came to the city of New Orleans to testify before this returning board could return unmolested to their homes and live in peace. I think I understood the Senator correctly.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will allow me, I asked why it was that an affidavit which could be made in New Orleans and published there could not be made and put secretly in a paper in the parish where the law required it to be made and did not require it to be published at all? If the Senator will permit me, the excuse given in various cases for the non-performance of the laws of Louisiana in not having the affidavits made at the time when the events were fresh and on the spot where they should be made by the party making them, in order to accompany the returns of the election, was that those affidavits were not made according to law as to time and place because of intimidation. Now my question was this: as the affidavits were only to be known to the persons who made them, sealed up and put in envelopes and conveyed in confidence to New Orleans, where was the difference in the amount of danger between the man who makes his affidavit secretly in De Soto, for instance, and the one who makes it openly in New Orleans? In either case New Orleans was to be the only place where publicity occurred.

Mr. WEST. In the city of New Orleans there happen to be at the present time perhaps from six to eight hundred troops of the Federal Army to maintain the peace. It is not a very convenient matter for an ignorant negro in the wilderness of the parishes throughout Louisiana to make affidavits without its being known to these white regulators; but they have come to New Orleans and under the protection of the Federal power they have made these affidavits; and how have they been treated on their return to their homes in the parishes where intimidation prevailed? Night before last I received a telegram from the United States marshal of Louisiana, stating the fact that every witness who had been to New Orleans to testify in regard to these outrages, upon his return to his home had been driven again from there, and was obliged to desert his crops and his home; and in some instances I think it will be proved that even greater violence has been done those witnesses than such as I have stated. At all events, the subject is now in the hands of the proper officers of the law, who will examine it, and I am in the hope that justice will be done; but such was the telegram, that when the witnesses who came to the city of New Orleans to testify under the protection of the National Government returned to their homes, they were persecuted and driven therefrom, and some of them killed.

I wished at one time while the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was speaking to allude to the case of John Gair. I will state the facts as far as I have knowledge of them. It has been charged that that murder was not a political murder. John Gair was a noted, outspoken colored republican, a natural leader and organizer of his party in the district of country where he lived, obnoxious from his color, obnoxious from his principles, obnoxious from his efficiency, to the other party which undertook to control political matters in that section. A certain Dr. Saunders in the town of Jackson, Louisiana, was taken one day with the colic. Dr. Saunders's cook was John Gair's sister. Dr. Saunders immediately imagined that he had been poisoned and a band of regulators came around the house and took that poor woman under a tree and took her dying confession that she had been instigated to poison Dr. Saunders by her brother, John Gair. The sequel of the poisoning case was that Dr. Saunders in four or five hours got over his colic and this woman, a sister of John Gair, hunted tall timber and was hung to a tree; and this band of regulators after getting through that operation went down to the parish jail where this man Gair was confined on some charge, and took him out upon the allegation that they were going to carry him back to this place and prefer a charge there that he had been an instigator of the poisoning, but they shot him upon the road, and that was the end of Gair. Whether that murder was political or otherwise, is for the country to judge, as many of these deeds of violence have been laid before them and they can form their opinions.

Now we take the case of Powers. The Senator from Delaware was particularly severe upon the governor of Louisiana for having appointed a noted regulator as tax collector. That was the governor's method of making terms with a bull-dozing democrat. He sought the peace of that community when they had expelled the legitimate officer, and made terms with an outrageous murderer.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that the customary action of the governor?

Mr. WEST. I will come to that. I am perfectly willing to admit that if we give the murderers of Louisiana, yes, sir, and perhaps if we give the lawless democracy of this country the offices, probably we shall have no trouble. There was a small example of it in that State. What does Mr. Weber say? The testimony goes to show you that this man Powers was at the head of these regulators. He confessed that he was their chief; he stated what their organization was; and if you will read the testimony you will find that all the while he was hunting office, that if he could only get an office he would stop murdering.

> Question. Did he apply through you for office under that party?
> Answer. Yes, sir.
> Q. How often did he apply through you for that office?
> A. Quite a number of times.
> Q. Did he finally obtain it?
> A. Yes, sir.

I desire to state right here that it was a matter of impossibility, almost, to get a responsible collector to collect taxes. Among those that the governor was considering we recommended Powers. Of two evils we chose the least.

The Senator from Delaware spoke of the unquestioned and untrammeled authority of the republican party in the State of Louisiana. Has the Senator not questioned it here successively for four years? Has he not risen in his place again and again, and once more to-day, and denounced the government of Louisiana as a usurpation? Has he not instigated by his example and by his precept men to revolution and to violence and to murder in that State? Does he remember that in September, 1874, by these very encouragements that had been received from here, a democratic mob rose in the city of New Orleans and undertook to overthrow the governor, sacrificing in that attempt some fifty or sixty lives? Does he not know that throughout that State in consequence of that action republicans were hurled from office even in this very parish? Does he not know that the authority of the republicans is disputed everywhere in that State, with no other redress and no other alternative except the one that the Senator from Ohio has spoken of, that the blacks should arm to protect themselves against the violence of the whites? How futile such an attempt! What was the history of the late rebellion? Could you have conquered the South by merely arming the blacks? Could the General of your armies have rallied around him there a force and pitted them against all the intelligence and courage of the white race of the South and have subdued them? No; but it took all your power here at the North aided by these black men to bring about peace. Now we are again remitted to that contest, and we are asked to let the poor black man fight it out. In this very parish that the Senator speaks of, and many others throughout that State, when an officer holding under republican commission so discharges his duty as to make himself obnoxious to democrats they rise en masse and whistle him down the wind; and you talk about untrammeled and unquestioned republican authority!

The governor of that State has been powerless. Whether his policy has been the correct one or not I cannot say; but we see that whenever peace is made by giving a murdering democrat an office then we find that all is tranquil and lovely there, and I have no doubt to-day that if we were willing to forswear and give up our rights as republicans and as citizens of the United States we could make terms there unquestionably, and peace and good order would reign. But that, I am sure, cannot be desired; that, I am sure, cannot be expected from us. If it does, if it ever comes to that, I think we must lay down our manhood by such a renunciation.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, one word. Perhaps the rules of order of this body might have been invoked when any Senator was charged with having by his precept and his example led to lawlessness and outrage. Such was the language in effect used by the Senator who has just taken his seat in regard to me. But I do not invoke the protection of the rules. It seems to me that it might have been wiser for him to have abstained from such remarks; for on the one side stand the records of my debates in this Chamber and stands the record of my personal life, and on the other side stands the charge. I leave them there to those who know both.

One word so far as affects the public interest in this question, and that is all that this debate should touch, for it was the last idea of mine in this debate or any other that there should be a personal suggestion made in it. I had made none except as bearing upon the official action of those who are properly to be considered responsible. But here again in the Senate is made a second confession by those who advocate the continuance of Governor Kellogg's rule in Louisiana, that he has made terms, by appointing to high official station, with a most lawless scoundrel. Why, Mr. President, is there any other State in this Union where if such a fact did exist or were proven but that the governor would be necessarily impeached by the Legislature in accordance with their duty. Think of it. As an excuse for the lawlessness in Louisiana, that the chief executive officer of the State shall make terms with a confessed scoundrel by giving him high office. O, sir, it seems to me that the case grows worse and worse as those who advocate that side of the controversy proceed.

Mr. WEST. Allow me to say that this man Frank Powers, that the Senator speaks of, was highly recommended by the democrats of that parish.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I simply want to congratulate the cause of humanity and of justice upon the evidence of progress we have had here to-day, and that is that the existence of these horrible crimes in the Southern States is no longer denied. The general system of denial which has prevailed for years seems to have been broken down. The character of these enormities has not been denied in the debate to-day; and, according to my recollection, it is the first debate of this kind that I have witnessed on the floor of the Senate where the existence of these crimes has not been denied.

The Senator from Delaware, however, asked why they are not punished. He seemed to put that question as if the fact that they were not punished was a justification for the crimes. "Why," said he, "are they not punished?" Mr. President, the answer to that question is on the surface. They are not punished because that intimidation which prevails in the South enters the court of justice, enters the jury box, enters the witness box, and prevails upon the bench with the judge. You can never have justice in any country where assassination awaits the juror and awaits the witness. The same force and violence that drive men from the polls prevent thousands of men from exercising their right, or compel them to vote a ticket that they abhor; that same force and violence intimidate the judge on the bench, and the juror in the box, and the witness upon the stand.

The Senator asked this question, how can ruffianism be abolished. I will tell him one long step toward abolishing the reign of ruffianism. It is when a great party shall no longer ignore its existence, when a great party shall no longer excuse it, when a great party shall no longer find justification for it. When its existence is admitted and when you go one step further and denounce it, you have taken a long step toward abolishing the reign of ruffianism. We have witnessed one step upon this floor, and a long step, and that is the admission of its existence. We have seen that a democratic committee that went to Louisiana for election purposes and came back with a plea, and a pettifogging plea, for their cause, were still compelled to admit in that plea the existence of these enormous crimes. One long step has been taken, I hope the next will speedily follow, and that is the denunciation of the terrible crimes that are admitted to exist.

Mr. President, a friend has put into my hands the report of the Mississippi investigation of this year, and as one of the ways in which justice is not administered and to show why these crimes are not punished, I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from William F. Tucker, of Okolona, to the foreman of the grand jury in the district court of the United States, as a reason why bills were not reported and criminals were not punished.

Mr. STEVENSON. The volume and page?

Mr. MORTON. Volume 2 of the Mississippi investigation, page 151 of the documentary evidence.

OKOLONA, MISSISSIPPI, June 12, 1876.

DEAR BILL: It is reported here that true bills are to be found against all the country around Okolona for the raid on the negro Baptist church and the charge of Stovall's brigade upon the viewless air from Egypt on day of election. If this be true, you ought to know; and I presume you do know that you, and you alone, will be held responsible for the action of the grand jury. You can very well imagine how pleasant a life you will lead among, say, two hundred men, who would all charge you with organizing a prosecution against them. You know I have always been your personal friend, and it is as a friend that I write to say if you are not already committed to that line of policy, don't allow the bills to be found. I think you know me well enough to give me credit for sincerity when I make such a suggestion.

I have abundant reasons for making it.

All well.

Yours,

W. F. TUCKER.

Mr. MORTON. There is the threat transmitted by a man who is said to be respectable and a prominent lawyer, to the foreman of the grand jury. I will now ask the Secretary to read the return made by the foreman of the grand jury to the judge of the court on page 150.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES GRAND-JURY ROOM,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI,
Oxford, July 8, 1876.

Hon. R. A. HILL, Judge, Presiding:

The United States grand jury for the northern district of Mississippi, at Oxford, June term, 1876, beg leave to report that they have examined two hundred and eighty-one witnesses, and found ninety true bills. A large majority of these bills were for violations of the revenue laws.

Although we have had a protracted session, we have only made a partial and cursory examination of the innumerable cases of violations of the election laws that have come to our knowledge. We regret to report that, from the examination had, we must say that the fraud, intimidation, and violence perpetrated at the late election is without a parallel in the annals of history, and that time would fail us to take the testimony that could be easily introduced demonstrating the fact that there is sufficient ground for the finding of thousands of indictments against persons who are grossly guilty of the above-mentioned violation of the election laws.

From the facts elicited during this grand inquest, and from our own knowledge of the reign of terror that was inaugurated during the late election campaign, we can only recommend to the citizens of Mississippi to make an earnest appeal to the strong arm of the United States Government to give them that protection that is guaranteed to every American citizen; that is, protection in freedom of speech, in their person and property, and the right of suffrage.

We do assert that all these rights were openly violated and trampled in the dust during the late election, and that there is no redress for these grievances under the present State government; and unless the United States Government enforces that shield of protection that is guaranteed by the Constitution to every American citizen, however humble and obscure, then may the citizens of Mississippi exclaim, Farewell to liberty! farewell to the freedom of the ballot-box!"

In conclusion, we would tender our thanks to his honor Judge Hill for his clear and concise charge made to us on our organization as a grand jury, and to the district attorney, Judge T. Walter, and his able assistant, B. W. Lee, for their able and impartial counsel during our sittings, and also to Colonel J. H. Pierce, marshal, and his indefatigable deputies, for their promptness in the discharge of their duties.

Respectfully submitted and adopted by the grand jury this 8th day of July, A. D. 1876.

WILLIAM D. FRAZIE, Foreman.
W. H. DODSON, Clerk.

The above is a true copy of the report of the United States grand jury at the June term, 1876.

B. W. LEE.
Assistant United States Attorney.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, so much on the question why these crimes are not punished. Since these crimes are now admitted, the next proper and natural step is to denounce them. Democratic committees go South; they come back with long pettifogging briefs which they call addresses, and publish them to the country; they admit the existence of these crimes, but have few words of condemnation, expending columns in the discussion of small questions of law, and overlooking the main great issue. This last campaign was a campaign of intimidation everywhere. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has put into my hand an extract from a democratic paper in Atlanta published just before the election, which fairly describes thousands published through the South during the recent campaign. I will ask to have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Atlanta, (Georgia,) Commonwealth, November 7.]

If there is any man in Fulton County with a white skin who is so lost to self-respect as to vote for a radical on next Tuesday, the community have an interest in knowing who he is, and we call on the democratic executive committee to see to it that the names of all such are enrolled for publication within three days after election.

Neither money nor social consideration will deter the Commonwealth from publishing the roll of infamy after the election is over. The white men of Fulton who vote the radical ticket on Tuesday are enemies to the people of Georgia, and their names shall be blazoned that all Georgians may know and shun them. This supreme struggle must extend to business and social relations, and he who is base enough to vote for our continued enslavement and degradation must be made to feel that he has committed a crime against his color, his family, and the best interest of the whole people.

Mr. MORTON. That editorial, of course, requires no explanation. That is one form of intimidation; but it is not that form of intimidation of which so much complaint has been made in Louisiana, South Carolina, Florida, and other States. It is that other form which comes with violence, with murder, with every kind of torture and of outrage. Whenever that shall cease to exist, or whenever all parties in the North shall come to condemn it, then we shall have peace in this country; but so long as there is a great party that ignore it, or who find excuses for it, or half way or full justification for it, so long it may be expected to exist.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I feel compelled, in the performance of a simple duty of justice, to have the other side of this story of the presentment of the grand jury of Mississippi brought before the Senate. The letter of Tucker to Frazie has been read, a letter whose impropriety no man can doubt; a letter for which Frazie showed his contempt by making it public, which gave a very good idea of how much he was intimidated by it. If it had been shown to the judge of the court, as it was Frazie's duty, a bench warrant would very soon have brought Mr. Tucker there to answer for an attempt to influence or intimidate a grand jury. But I find that there was sent into the Senate by the President of the United States a letter from the United States district attorney accompanied by this very report of the grand jury. It appears that that grand jury was composed of twenty-one members, consisting of twenty republicans and one democrat. It appears by the laws of the United States that, while the white men of Mississippi and other States are held accountable for the wrongs and outrages which are committed in the States, they are not allowed to sit upon the juries and raise their voices and give their votes in condemnation and punishment. At this very time and hour—I say it to the discredit of Congress—if any man ever gave even a cup of water to his dying son, if that son had been in arms against the United States, if any man in any way gave aid or comfort to anybody that he knew to be engaged in warfare against the United States, that fact forms a cause of disqualification and a ground of challenge that shall not allow him to sit upon any grand or petit jury in any court of the United States. Mr. President, is this wise or right, thus to keep from the jury that class of men whom you are constantly invoking to enforce the laws, and whom you prevent from taking a citizen's share in their enforcement? Why should not that law be repealed? Twice the House of Representatives has sought to repeal it, and as often the Senate has defeated the attempt. These men are in the Union; they are in the States; they are subject to the jurisdiction of the laws of the Government of the United States. Pray, should they not be as citizens, and ought you not, when you call upon them for the duties of citizens, give them the ordinary and usual privileges and powers of citizens? So it is to-day that on that grand jury there stood twenty republicans and a single democrat. Now I wish to read to the Senate what the district attorney, Mr. Thomas Walton, said in regard to the state of affairs about which that letter was written:

OXFORD, MISSISSIPPI, July 15, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith the report of the grand jury lately in session here, together with the evidence on which it is based. This evidence, you will see, plainly required the jury to indict a great many persons for violations of the election laws; but, out of eighteen jurors, seven were found who refused to concur in any such indictment. I learn, however, that all but one of the jurors voted for this report. All but this one professed to belong to the republican party; and some of those who finally voted against the eleven who were for the indictments were throughout the whole session apparently the most reliable men we had to sustain the indictments and the most zealous in investigating the cases. This was particularly true of the man who wrote this report; yet he finally went against all prosecutions, though we had conceived him to be the most earnest, as he had certainly been the most active, man among us, in bringing to justice, or at least in investigating the election cases.

I can only lament the shameful failure of justice which has taken place, and I have little doubt that it must and will give a most unbridled license to lawlessness at the next State, if not at the next Federal, election.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS WALTON,
United States District Attorney.

Hon. ALPHONSO TAFT,
Attorney-General.

Mr. President, you have seen the report, and here you see the explanation of the report given by the United States district attorney. I ask any man, who is to blame for this "shameful failure of justice?" Who is to blame? The Senator from Indiana says you are to blame the white people of the State of Mississippi whom you have excluded from that grand jury and from the petit jury. They are those who are to blame when you have prevented their voice from attempting to procure punishment for evil-doers. The Senator from Indiana made a great mistake. He sought to use that report for the purpose of staining the white people of Mississippi, and lo and behold it turns out that the whole default and "shameful failure of justice" was entirely at the hands of those who were the warm and earnest partisans of the party to which he is attached.

Now, sir, surely, surely there must be a sense of justice in human breasts. It cannot be that when by law you exclude these men from the jury-box, either grand or petit, and when you have packed or filled the jury-box with partisans of only one political hue, you are to hold responsible for the default of your own party friends those who were prevented from having any voice to make up for their defaults. This is the truth; and I think if the Senator from Indiana had known the whole of the truth he would not have brought forth that portion of it which he did.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to what seems to me to be an erroneous view of the report of Mr. Walton. The report of Mr. Walton to the Attorney-General, as I understand it, is this: That certain members of the grand jury and republicans refused to find, upon evidence which Mr. Walton thought sufficient, true bills against persons who had been engaged in outrages and murders during the canvass and at the election in Mississippi. That is exactly what is alleged. That, as I understand, is the claim of those who maintain that these outrages in Mississippi have not only controlled the elections by preventing men from appearing at the ballot-box and exercising their franchise upon their own judgment, but that these outrages have extended so far that they control the action of juries and intimidate the courts. It may be a weakness in republicans who are called to aid in the administration of the laws as jurors that they are intimidated; but the fact still remains that they are intimidated, and if it be true, as I believe it is true, that Mr. Frazie, the foreman of the grand jury to whom the letter of Mr. Tucker was addressed, was not himself intimidated so that he hesitated to find true bills of indictment against persons charged with crimes, it nevertheless remains true that his associates, to whom the contents of this letter were made known, were intimidated, and it was just as much an arrest of the true and proper course of justice whether this letter was written by a friend who chose to warn Mr. Frazie of what was in store for him, or whether it was written by a political and personal enemy who purposed to take part in the transactions of which Mr. Frazie was forewarned. In either case the effect in interrupting the course of justice was precisely the same.

I think, therefore, that the Senator from Delaware does not give to this letter its full force, and that it is no escape from the position taken that Mr. Frazie, to whom the letter was addressed, was not intimidated if his associates were intimidated. The fact remains that here were twenty-one jurors, no matter if twenty of them were republicans and only one a democrat; they were the servants of the law, called together in conformity to the statute; and it is no excuse or palliation, or defense for these wrongs that the Congress of the United States may not have done its duty by exempting from the inhibition spoken of certain portions of the people of the country; but the fact remains that the course of justice has been upon the return of Mr. Walton interfered with, and that two or three thousand persons against whom indictments should have been found, as is stated by the foreman of the grand jury, escaped. That is the statement.

Mr. THURMAN. Two or three thousand in one county?

Mr. BOUTWELL. In the northern district of Mississippi. This was the United States court presided over by Judge Hill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I submit to the sense, the reason of the Senate, what amount of intimidation can there be upon a grand jury which shall openly publish to the world the most extreme charges against everybody and yet withhold its charges against the guilty individuals of the community. What presumption in common sense is there that there was intimidation upon this body of twenty republicans and one democrat, when at the same time they charge the whole community of Mississippi broadcast with the most positive crime and yet omit, according to their oaths, to pick out the guilty individuals and charge them? Is it safer to charge everybody and mingle everybody up with this wholesale abuse, than to pick out the guilty individual and let him alone suffer for the crimes which he has committed? And yet here is the fact that this body agree to and sign a report charging the worst possible condition of affairs upon the community and dare not on their oaths bring forward a single indictment against any one man. Does not the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts destroy itself? Nay, further than that, the publication by Frazie probably of the note which he had received shows that he laughed to scorn the idea of intimidating him; that he not only scorned it, but he published it to prove how absurd and ridiculous were such attempts to affect him at all. And the grand jury, to show that they cared no more than he did, published even stronger statements against the whole of their fellow-citizens, but they did not allege that any specific persons were guilty of crime. Neither the district attorney, who is their anxious partisan, nor the grand jury themselves have ventured in either of their communications to allege that they were deterred in the least by intimidation from doing their full duty. The district attorney who sends this very report to the President designated it as a "shameful failure of justice" on the part of that grand jury, and he does not say that they were prevented from doing their duty by anything like intimidation, nor do they say so. The idea is not suggested anywhere; but, on the contrary, it is entirely disproved by the free publication of his letter and by the publication of the report of the grand jury, which I very well remember was at the instance of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts appended to the documentary testimony which we took in Mississippi; and it came to us afterward in the additional shape of a message of the President of the United States, who held that the effect of a call for information as to the state of affairs in South Carolina by some means included a reference to the State of Mississippi. So I submit to the good sense of the Senate that so far from the action of the grand jury suggesting the least intimidation, it is proof positive, both affirmatively and by exclusion, that there was no such thing as intimidation produced upon their minds and that none had been attempted which they did not laugh at.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the physical disability under which I have labored for the last week forbids me participating in this debate; but I rise to make a statement of fact. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated that he regarded the killing of John Gair as political in its character. I stated to him that such was not my understanding; that in a conversation which I held with Governor Kellogg in November, 1876, I understood that the killing of John Gair was in no sense political. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] rose to correct me in my statement and said that it was political, but he has given me no proof except that John Gair was a colored man. Now I will give to that Senator the statement of a gentleman who ought to be high authority with him. Governor Warmoth in November, 1876, at New Orleans stated to a member of the House of Representatives and a member of the democratic committee that John Gair was hung in 1875 upon an alleged charge of poisoning, that he was hung by men irrespective of party, and that there were as many republicans present at that hanging as there were democrats. I state this that Governor Warmoth may see it. The gentleman to whom he made the statement is now upon this floor.

Mr. President, we stand amid events too momentous to the country, it seems to me, to justify us in attempting to forestall public opinion by the citation of isolated facts of murders which occur everywhere, and which it is now attempted to show are political. I know nothing about these occurrences. I am satisfied that the case of John Gair, which occurred more than a year before the late election in Louisiana, was not political, and I state to the Senator from Louisiana and to the Senator from Ohio that Governor Warmoth is the authority upon which I rest the statement that there were as many republicans engaged in the hanging as there were democrats. I would infer from that that it was in no way political.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has said and repeated, for it is very much the habit of the Senator, and perhaps a very wise one, when he says what he thinks a good thing to repeat it, that it has been admitted here to-day that this intimidation of which he complains, by means of riot and murder and the like, has taken place. His words imported that all that he or the republican party have charged on this subject has been admitted here to-day by democratic Senators. Sir, if there has been any such admissions I have not heard it. I heard the Senator's special pleading to prove that it was admitted by the committee at the head of which stood Governor Palmer of Illinois. It seemed to me to be an argument without any satisfactory basis. I am quite sure that when I sat on the bench I never could have given judgment for any such argument as that, for it was altogether too inconclusive. And so, sir, his statement here that these matters have been admitted is a pure creation of his own fancy. Certainly it has not been denied, and it never has been denied, and the Senator cannot recall a single instance of its denial since he has held a place in the Senate, that violations of the law have taken place in the South, as certainly he cannot deny that violations of the law have taken place elsewhere than in the South. He cannot deny that they have taken place in his own State. I cannot deny that they have taken place in Ohio. The Senator from Pennsylvania cannot deny that they have taken place there. And perhaps no Senator on this floor can deny that there have been violations of the law everywhere, and there is not a country on the face of the globe in which the law has not been violated.

But that I have admitted, or that any man on this side of the Chamber has admitted, that these exaggerated statements about intimidation at the South for political purposes are true; that it has been admitted here that the southern people are a set of assassins; that the white people of the South, who have the property and the intelligence and who of all other persons are most interested in the prevalence of law and order, are a set of banditti; that that has been admitted is without the slightest foundation at all. It has not been admitted. That there have been violations of law down there, nobody denies; that violence has gone unpunished, nobody denies; but, pray, is Louisiana the only State in which violations of law have gone unpunished? Did the Senator ever read the history of what was called the whisky insurrection in Western Pennsylvania? Does he not know that hundreds of persons engaged in what was called that insurrection, and which was so much an insurrection that Washington himself was sent with an army against it, were not even indicted in the courts; that no step was taken for their punishment? Does not the Senator know that the men who murdered Joe Smith in Illinois and the men who invaded Nauvoo and reduced it to ruins never were indicted, never were punished? Does he not know that elsewhere in this country, does he not know that in his own State the men at Seymour who committed murder after murder have never been brought to justice? Does he not know that again and again and again in this country these violations of law have taken place under high popular excitement without the men being brought to punishment? And will he denounce the people of every State in which such things have occurred as being a set of assassins and banditti? No, sir; it will not do.

The Senator was pleased further to say that there can be an end put to this if the democratic party first will confess his indictment—for that is what it comes to—with all its exaggerations, and then will denounce these atrocities. Why, sir, the Senator himself has never denounced more strongly than the democratic Senators on this floor, since I have held a seat here, the violence, the unlawful violence that has occurred in the South. I know we have not exaggerated it as he has; we have not made ten murders out of one murder; we have not said that every murder that took place was a political murder; but where there was a clear case of political violation of the law, against the Ku Klux and against every other set of men who banded to violate the law, the denunciations of the democratic Senators on this floor from the time I took my seat here have been quite as strong as have been the denunciations of the Senator from Indiana. We did not exaggerate; we did not take for fact that which mere rumor said was the fact; we asked for the proof, and when the proof was forthcoming we denounced it. Why, sir, we had more reason than anybody else to denounce it. We knew very well that every such violation was seized upon by demagogues at the North to excite the northern people against the southern people; we knew that it was the staple of republican electioneering, so much so that it got to be baptized with a name, and was called "the waving of the bloody shirt." We know, sir, that it acquired a baptism, because every single instance of that sort that could be adduced, even where it was not well founded in fact, and much more when it was well founded in fact, was used to the injury of the democratic party of this Union, to their injury at the North, and to excite the people at the North against the South, and to furnish still further reason for trampling them under foot. We knew it, and therefore we opposed it, and appealed again and again; and it is seven years I believe, six years certainly, since a Senator from Alabama, a republican Senator, rose in his place in this Chamber and rendered to me personal thanks in a speech delivered to the Senate for the denunciation of the Ku Klux which I uttered on that occasion; and I was not alone; I was only one of the few democratic Senators here, and every one of them spoke the same sentiment. And yet the Senator from Indiana says that if we had acknowledged the fact and denounced it, it would have ceased. Why, sir, he said that six years ago. Sir, I can tell you that these charges of intimidation will not cease as long as under the mere pretense of intimidation you can overthrow the votes of the people of a State. As long as you have this machinery of a returning board, a perfectly irresponsible returning board, according to the present claim that on the vague notion of intimidation you can change the result of an election, as in the case of this very same James Madison Wells's parish in the count of 1875, who disfranchised his whole parish on his own affidavit, deprived it of its three members whom it had elected to the Legislature, and put in three men who had not been elected, on his own mere affidavit, alleging intimidation when he was not there, his affidavit not made in public, not submitted to the inspection of the public, but filed after that board went into secret session, and was never seen by the men who were elected, never seen by their counsel, never seen by the public. As long as such things as that can be done there will be claims of the votes of these States being controlled by intimidation. Why, Mr. President, it is a new feature introduced into the American Constitution and the American system of government. We did think once that the only question about an election was, who has a majority of the votes? That is what we thought; that is what our fathers thought when they made our Constitution; but that is not the question any more. The question is not who has the majority of the votes, but who has the majority of the men who count the votes?

Mr. MITCHELL rose.

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather not yield just now.

If you have a returning board with a majority ready to count out democratic candidates and count in republican candidates, they have a power as great as the tribunes of the Roman people had to veto the voice of the people; not simply to veto what the people have done, but to determine what the people ought to have done, according to their judgment of what they think to be best. That is it, sir.

And now my colleague, in the very impassioned and very eloquent speech he made to-day, says that this results, as I understand him, from the color line. I tell him that I stand prepared to prove that the responsibility for the color line rests on his party. I tell him that I stand prepared to prove that millions of the people's money have been expended to establish the color line. I know very well why the right of suffrage was given to the colored men. It is not matter of speculation; it is not matter of inference; it was openly avowed when the fifteenth amendment was under consideration; openly avowed in this Senate, that the republican party needed the 500,000 negro votes that could be given if the fifteenth amendment were adopted; that the republican party needed them, and that without them the republican party would lose its power in the United States. Yes, sir, the republican party did need them; and the trouble now is that the republican party do not get them. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, they talk of intimidation! Here are thousands of negro men in Louisiana who come up and say "we voted the democratic ticket." I have seen it stated as high as thousands; call it hundreds if you choose; call it any number you please; they come up and say "we voted the democratic ticket." What does the returning board say? Count their votes? Not at all; they say "you were intimidated to vote the democratic ticket." What then? They come up and make affidavit that they voted the democratic ticket, and that they voted it without intimidation. What does the returning board say? "You were intimidated to make the affidavit." And so it goes.

Why, sir, where is the end of this? Cannot any man who has the least honesty and the least sagacity in the world see that if such practices as these be tolerated, anything like republican institutions and free government and a free ballot are at an end. You put the destinies of whole States in the hands of four irresponsible men called a returning board, and then talk about a republican form of government! You want to invoke the whole force of the Government, its Army, its Navy, to secure to a State a republican form of government; and you put in the hands of four irresponsible men, and not of the highest character either, the right to determine upon the phase of the government of that State. And yet you call that a republican form of government!

Mr. President, it will not do; no sir, it will not do. My colleague said, with great force and eloquence, that if elections were to be carried in this country by intimidation there was an end of republican institutions. I agree with him; and I tell him, and I say to each one of you, that if elections are to be carried by the use of the Army of the United States and its intimidation, there is an end of republican institutions. Sir, all the intimidation that ever actually existed on the part of the democratic or the white people of the South, is but as a drop in the bucket to the danger of that intimidation which comes from the standing Army of the United States. Anarchy in any country at last corrects itself, for it cannot be borne; but the use of a standing army to control the people has been fatal to liberty ever since a republic existed. I agree with my colleague that intimidation of the voters is fatal to republican government; but I ask him, while his mind, heated and excited by what he has seen and by what he has heard, is brooding over cases of homicide, of violence, and the like, to think of the far greater danger of intimidation by that organized body which carries the sword and the bayonet and wields the artillery of the Army. I ask him to think of that much graver danger of intimidation from him who shall hold in his hand the purse and the sword. I ask him to remember that there have been Cæsars and Cromwells and Bonapartes in the world who have overthrown republican institutions; but republican institutions never yet have been overthrown by the kind of intimidation of which he speaks.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator says "it will not do; no, sir, it will not do." The Senator likes to repeat a good thing. The Senator has taken the alarm. He now says there have been no admissions made here to-day of the existence of these great crimes. He says he has made none. I do not think he has; or if he has, he can easily take it back. But he cannot take back what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said. That is on the record. If I heard that Senator aright, he proceeded to say that he did not deny the existence of these crimes which shocked humanity; but he went on to state, among other things, that they were brought about by congressional and executive interference. The Senator cannot take back the admission made by this democratic committee that went to Louisiana and has returned that the existence of these crimes is not denied, but is admitted. But, sir, for the purpose of meeting these slaughters that have occurred from time to time and that have shocked the whole world, the Senator goes back and comes down with great power upon the men who murdered Joe Smith. He is dreadfully worried about the murder of Joe Smith; and that is a set-off. Then he goes to Pennsylvania to the Molly Maguires. He is indignant about those murders, and brings them in as a set-off against these crimes that are committed in the South. It is that kind of thing that has encouraged these crimes, whether so intended or not; it is that kind of defense that has encouraged these men to go on when they find themselves excused or their acts denied or justified. When they are denounced as they ought to be, when their crimes are proclaimed, then we may expect an abatement of them; but so long as they are smoothed over and justified by crimes elsewhere and diminished and belittled, so long we may expect to have them continued.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall take the vote on this resolution. It will not interrupt the debate at all to pass the resolution; it will come up on a dozen questions all the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the vote being taken on the resolution?

Mr. THURMAN. When the next resolution comes up, the same amendment will be offered to it, and that will be adopted; and if we vote now on both it does not put an end to the debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should prefer to take the vote on both.

Mr. SHERMAN. The second resolution must have the assent of the House of Representatives. I take it if they want the other document they will get it. They can amend the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I want the same amendment on both.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator object to taking the vote on the first resolution?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senate want to take a vote on both, I do not object. I do not know whether that is the general desire or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now let us take up the next resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, reported yesterday by the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 10,000 additional copies of the letter of the President, with the accompanying documents, on the election in Louisiana be printed; of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the Senate and 7,500 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the same amendment to that resolution which was made to the preceding one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-vessel at Wolf-Trap light-station, in the State of Virginia; and

A bill (S. No. 745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the brig A. S. Pennell to the City of Moule.

The message also announced that the House had rejected the bill (S. No. 338) for the relief of Luther Hall.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4189) authorizing the coining of the standard silver dollar and restoring its legal-tender character; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of the electoral messengers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 1057) to provide for engraving and printing the portrait of the late Hon. Henry Starkweather, of Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 1588) granting an additional pension to Jefferson Bowers, of Mason County, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of J. T. McGinniss, captain Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, requesting information "as to whether troops of the United States were stationed at the city of Petersburgh, in the State of Virginia, on the 7th of November, 1876, and, if so, under what authority and for what purpose," I submit the inclosed letters from the Secretary of War, to whom the resolution was referred, together with the report of the General of the Army and accompanying papers.

These inclosures will give all the information called for by the resolution, and I confidently believe will justify the action taken. It is well understood that the presence of United States troops at polling places never prevented the free exercise of the franchise by any citizen of whatever political faith. If, then, they have had any effect whatever upon the ballot cast, it has been to insure protection to the citizen casting it, in giving it to the candidate of his unbiased choice, without fear, and thus securing the very essence of liberty. It may be the presence of twenty-four United States soldiers under the command of a captain and lieutenant, quartered in the custom-house at Petersburgh, Virginia, on the 7th of November, at a considerable distance from any polling-place, without any interference on their part whatever, and without going near the polls during the election, may have secured a different result from what would have been obtained if they had not been there (to maintain the peace in case of riot) on the face of the returns. But if such is the case it is only proof that in this one congressional district in the State of Virginia the legal and constitutional voters have been able to return as elected the candidate of their choice.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 14, 1876.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following communication from the Attorney-General; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 13, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution dated the 12th instant, directing me to communicate the number of deputy marshals employed in connection with the election held the 7th ultimo, the number for each State and each voting precinct, the time of their service, the causes, necessity, and object of their employment, together with the nature of the duties required of them and performed by them.

The information desired is not in the possession of the Attorney-General and can only be obtained from the several marshals of the United States who have the power to appoint special deputy marshals under the title, "The Elective Franchise," Revised Statutes.

This Department will at once seek to procure the information so that it may be transmitted to the Senate at as early a day as practicable.

Very respectfully,

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Attorney-General.

Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4189) authorizing the coining of the standard silver dollar and restoring its legal-tender character, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of the electoral messengers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MANNER OF COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to present to the Senate as a supplement to the statement made by Mr. McDonald, which is already printed, the corresponding history of the electoral vote in the House of Representatives as carefully compiled from the journals of the proceedings. I have read it; it comes from very careful hands; and I propose to have it printed for the use of the Senate. I ask that it may be done. To-morrow I propose to introduce a resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Printing, to print extra copies to accompany the other compilation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the paper being printed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAYARD. Not the usual number. There is no motion to print extra copies yet. To-morrow I will ask for extra copies.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that this is a paper that comes here by any authority of this House. It is a mere compilation of some gentleman outside, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. It has been made by an extremely careful and competent person.

Mr. MORRILL. I doubt not.

Mr. BAYARD. It represents the action of the House of Representatives in the matter on which our Chief Clerk has compiled the action of the Senate. It is the other half of the history of this important question. I take leave to say that I have made a very fair examination of it, and I believe it will be most interesting and valuable to us all.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not object to the printing of it, but it seems to me that this, like other documents that have more authority than this, should go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONKLING. If Senators will hear me a moment, I beg to suggest that it is precisely on a footing with the other compilation. I was under an error in that regard myself and inquired of the Chair whether the other compilation was not made in response to a resolution; but upon inquiry it turned out that that resolution had been previously answered and therefore that compilation was made by the very competent gentleman who made it, and presented just as the Senator from Delaware presents this. We ordered it to be printed, as I hope we shall order this to be printed, in order that we may get all the light possible. I feel in no danger myself of learning too much or being made too intelligent on any of the things on which we may be called upon to vote; and therefore I hope the Senator from Vermont will allow us all to see this paper in print.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the order to print the usual number will be made.

THE MASSACHUSETTS STATUES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to say, in behalf of my colleague and myself, that on Tuesday next, after the morning hour, we shall ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes to the presentation of the statues contributed by the State of Massachusetts for the old Hall of the House of Representatives.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. In order to leave it the unfinished business for to-morrow, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the Oregon electoral vote.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 14, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

METRIC SYSTEM OF GOLD COINAGE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4190) to promote the establishment of the metric system of coinage in the gold coins of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4191) to provide for existing national banking associations becoming stockholders as such in any newly organized national bank; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

WHALE ROCK, NARRAGANSETT BAY.

Mr. EAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Commerce, Senate bill No. 492, making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narragansett Bay.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MEMORIAL STATUES FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. HOAR. The delegation from Massachusetts desire to present to the United States the memorial statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams. The resolution upon that subject will be taken up in the Senate on Tuesday next and will be sent over here that day. Upon consultation with yourself and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I understand that that time will be most appropriate as regards the business of the House. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be now ordered by the House that on the reception of that resolution from the Senate on Tuesday next it shall be considered in the House.

There was no objection and it was so ordered.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Accounts, submitted the following report:

The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be, and they are hereby, instructed to designate the committees of this House which are entitled to clerks under the act of August 15, 1876, and report to this House"— respectfully state that they have considered said resolution and designate the following committees as entitled to clerks in the manner hereinafter indicated:

1. To the Committee of Elections a clerk.
2. To the Committee on Banking and Currency a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.
3. To the Committee on Commerce a clerk.
4. To the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a clerk.
5. To the Committee for the District of Columbia a clerk.
6. To the Committee on the Judiciary a clerk.
7. To the Committee on Indian Affairs a clerk.
8. To the Committee on Education and Labor a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.
9. To the Committee on Manufactures and the Committee on Agriculture jointly one clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on the Militia.
10. To the Committee on Naval Affairs a clerk.
11. To the Committee on Military Affairs a clerk.
12. To the Committee on Foreign Affairs a clerk.
13. To the Committee on the Territories a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings.
14. To the Committee on Private Land Claims a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Railways and Canals.
15. To the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.
16. To the Committee on Patents a clerk.
17. To the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Public Expenditures.
18. To the Committee of Accounts a clerk.
19. To the Joint Committee on Printing a clerk, who shall also act as clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.
20. To the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States, and the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, jointly one clerk.
21. To the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, jointly one clerk.

The report was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HORACE B. GARDNER.

Mr. TEESE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4192) for the relief of Horace B. Gardner, of Newark, New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

H. F. WILLINK.

Mr. HARTRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4193) for the relief of H. F. Willink; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSENGER FOR REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back the following resolution with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That one messenger be added to the list of messengers under the Doorkeeper of the House, to be assigned for duty to the room of the official reporters of debates, which room is now unattended to.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT V. BOGART.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4194) for the relief of Robert V. Bogart, of Beaver Dam, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have been directed by the Committee of Claims to report back sundry bills, petitions, &c., which have been improperly referred to our committee, and to ask that they be referred to the several committees indicated upon the back of the respective papers.

There being no objection, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the following; which were respectively referred as indicated:

A bill (H. R. No. 3909) for the relief of Columbus Reid, of Louisiana—to the Committee on War Claims.

Petition of John Corruth and others, of Mississippi—to the same committee.

A bill (H. R. No. 3662) for the relief of James Dickson—to the same committee.

A bill (H. R. No. 3744) for the relief of Dr. John H. Long—to the same committee.

Petition of Thomas G. Morgan, praying re-imbursement for losses sustained during the war—to the same committee

A communication from the Secretary of War, dated May 29, 1876, transmitting a report of the Commissary-General of the United States Army upon the bill (H. R. No. 2257) for the relief of Captain J. F. McGinnis, Thirteenth Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in regard to the claim of the heirs of Abel Lee, on account of Indian depredations—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 4175) for the relief of the widow of Captain Christopher M. Haile, United States Army—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARCUS ERWIN.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4195) for the relief of Marcus Erwin, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS J. SPENCER.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4198) to restore Thomas J. Spencer, late first lieutenant of the Tenth United States Cavalry, to his former rank in the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION OF THE BLIND.

Mr. WATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4196) to promote the education of the blind; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. KNOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, which has leave to report at any time on this question, to report back the resolution referred to that committee on motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] and to move the adoption of the following substitute therefor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States:

And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed, to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker of this House to ascertain and report what are the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. KNOTT. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to, and then the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TROOPS AT FORT SILL, ETC.

Mr. THROCKMORTON by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish a statement to this House showing the number of regiments or companies of troops now stationed at Fort Sill in the Indian Territory, and at Forts Richardson and Griffin in Texas, and the number of enlisted men and officers at each of said posts.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF ELECTORAL MESSENGERS.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of electoral messengers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that for the payment of the messengers of the respective States for conveying to the seat of Government the votes of the electors of said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, at the rate of twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance by the most usual route of travel from the place of meeting of the electors to the seat of Government of the United States, computed for one distance only, the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to have this bill put upon its passage at this time. The appropriations made heretofore have been twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars. I am informed that $20,000 will be sufficient to pay the expenses of these messengers, who are now on their way to this city or have already arrived here. It is necessary that the appropriation should be made at once, and I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS OF BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. ROBERTS, (by request,) and by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4199) to provide for the payment of a full month's wages to certain of the employés of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing permanently discharged February last, 1876; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA E. WHITE.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 1016) for the relief of Virginia E. White, of Ohio County, West Virginia, to which objection was made yesterday; but that objection has now been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill is on the Private Calendar in Committee of the Whole House, and therefore it is necessary to discharge that committee from its further consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose, and hope no one will object. It is simply a bill to re-imburse taxes forced by distraint directly in opposition to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I object. There are a good many cases on the Private Calendar preceding that, which ought to be first taken up and considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-five minutes past twelve o'clock. The Chair is of opinion that the first business in order in the morning hour to-day is a resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] on the 8th of December. On that day, under the operation of Rule 52, two resolutions were offered in the morning hour for consideration. Those resolutions giving rise to debate, were, under the operation of the rule, laid over. There is no other rule of the House directory as to when those resolutions should again be considered; but the Chair thinks it would be a violation of the equity of the rule under which they were introduced, and at variance with common sense, if there was no subsequent time allowed for their consideration. The jumping over of those resolutions by the introduction of other business, as reports from committees, would operate unjustly, and the Chair therefore rules that the unfinished business in the morning hour having been disposed of, these resolutions come up in order. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be read. But if any member of the House would like to be heard on this ruling, the Chair will be glad to hear him.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the Chair if such a practice as that indicated in the ruling of the Chair has ever prevailed before in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated when these resolutions were introduced under the call of States and Territories that it was the first time in his recollection or his knowledge that such resolutions had been introduced in the morning hour under the operation of the fifty-second rule.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me that if such a construction gave to resolutions which were introduced and laid over when objected to a preference, it might materially interfere with the progress of other business. If the Chair, however, has considered that question, I do not object to his ruling.

The SPEAKER. It is still competent for the House to give any other direction in regard to the bringing of these resolutions before the House for consideration. But the Chair is at a loss to conceive why permission should be given for the introduction in order of a resolution in the morning hour if that resolution should be denied consideration at any subsequent time in the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say a word on this question. This is the only way provided by our rules by which a resolution can be brought before the House as other business is brought before the House to be disposed of by a majority vote. A study of our system and practice will show at once what is in order in the morning hour. It is assigned in the first place for the consideration of reports of committees, a certain length of time being allowed to each committee; and then the States and Territories are placed in the same position relative to business in the morning hour. Heretofore reports from committees only have been considered, but resolutions from States have just the same right.

I have seen members of this House hold resolutions in their hands for three months and never get an opportunity to have them considered, because the call of States after committees was not had. Now, if, as has been announced this morning, these resolutions which were offered, and whose consideration is objected to, cannot be taken up and considered in the morning hour before again proceeding to a call of committees, then there is no time at which a member of the House can offer a resolution for consideration.

The morning hour on Monday can very easily be occupied by the business of the first call, as has been done every Monday morning hour during almost the entire session, and no other time is left for resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that in that way Rule 52 would be nullified.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes; and any other ruling than that of the Chair would be contrary to the spirit of that rule. I am satisfied the Chair has made a correct ruling.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There is so much confusion in the Hall that I doubt very much whether a large majority of the members on this side of the House understand the importance of this announcement of the Chair. As I understand it——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will suspend for a moment until order is restored. Gentlemen will please cease conversation. The Chair desires perfect order while this question is before the House. It is an important one, a new one, and one which every member of the House should understand thoroughly. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair would allow me one word, I wish to ask the Speaker to let this pass without a special ruling this morning, that members may examine the rules and see what the effect of such a ruling might be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot let it pass. The decision of this question must be made at this point.

Mr. CONGER. Might not the consideration of these resolutions be proceeded with by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be safer to adopt that course until we have had time to examine the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question comes up for the Chair to decide: What is the order of business in the morning hour? The Chair has decided that in his opinion these resolutions are in order, and are the first business in order in the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I thought that we might perhaps avoid establishing a precedent without the fullest consideration.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If I understand the announcement of the Chair, the practical effect of the enforcement of this ruling would be that all resolutions to which objection is made at the time of their being proposed to the House would go over and be placed on the Calendar to come up in the morning for action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that where the resolution under a rule of the House is introduced in the morning hour, and has the privilege of being introduced for consideration in the absence of objection, when debate arises and that resolution lies over under the rule, the resolution has the right to be considered in the morning hour whenever the business then pending in the morning hour is disposed of; otherwise this resolution would never again be reached.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I so understood the Chair. But I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the practical effect of the enforcement and operation of this rule. As we progress in our session by days and weeks there will be a large collection of these resolutions to be disposed of only in the morning hour, and that would exclude the consideration of reports from committees, and it would interfere materially with the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is always within the province of the House, by a majority vote, to dispose of any pending resolution.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It might be laid aside so that it might not interfere with the pending business.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; but the House has always control of the business pending before it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asks unanimous consent that these resolutions be passed over for the present.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that they remain pending without any ruling on the question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot bring them in without a ruling.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that there is no inconvenience about this ruling of the Chair. At the last session the same ruling was made, and the unfinished business came up and was disposed of under Rule 56, on page 225 of the Manual, which is as follows:

And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.—Rule 56.

This enables us to clear off the docket of this class of business without any trouble at all. I hope the ruling of the Chair will be sustained.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The proper construction of the rule would be, that after the reports of committees are called for, then the regular order of business can be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. That is in the introduction of resolutions, not in their consideration, otherwise their consideration may never be reached.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It would be reached in its proper time, which would be after the reports of committees. Resolutions would then be in order, and the rule would require that they be taken up in the order of presentation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is what we did yesterday. We took up in the morning hour the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] and proceeded to consider that bill. We are doing now what the gentleman suggests.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no doubt as to the propriety of the ruling, and surely none as to the justice of it.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The first resolution under this order, introduced by Mr. LE MOYNE on the 8th instant, was read as follows:

Whereas serious differences of opinion may arise between members of the two Houses of Congress as to their jurisdiction and powers in joint session in counting the electoral vote, and the questions involved being questions of law:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to appoint a committee to act with a committee of five, to be appointed by the Speaker of this House, in presenting to the Supreme Court such questions as either of said committee may deem important in the premises, and in asking the members of the Supreme Court to give to Congress an opinion thereon.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] who made the inquiry, the Chair now rules that under Rule 41 the question is, Will the House now proceed to consider this resolution?

Mr. COX. Will it be in order to move——

Mr. HOSKINS. When this resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] I rose in my place and demanded under the rules that it should lie over one day, as I desired to debate it. If the Chair now recognizes me as entitled to the floor——

The SPEAKER. If the House shall determine that it will now consider this resolution, the Chair will recognize——

Mr. COX. Will it be in order to move to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CLYMER. Let it be referred to the special committee authorized this morning.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I raise the question of consideration in regard to this resolution. I think the House has disposed of this very proposition by its action this morning.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be referred to the special committee authorized this morning to be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not entertain that motion at present, until the question of consideration is determined. The question is, Will the House now consider this resolution?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 30.

Mr. COX. I move to refer this resolution to the special committee, and I call the previous question on that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order that no quorum voted upon the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. That point is well taken.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOSKINS and Mr. COX were appointed.

Mr. COX. I desire to inquire of the Chair who will be entitled to the floor if the House determine to consider this resolution at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] who claims the floor to debate the resolution; but the Chair thinks that the gentleman who introduced the resolution [Mr. LE MOYNE] will be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOSKINS. If the Chair pleases, the gentleman who introduced the resolution yielded the floor at the time he introduced it. I have inquired of him this morning, and he says that he does not desire to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot understand why the gentleman who introduced the resolution has not control of it.

Mr. HALE. Did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] rise for the very purpose of debating the resolution, and did not that attitude of his carry the resolution over?

The SPEAKER. The rising to debate a resolution is simply a form of objection to its present consideration under the rule.

Mr. HALE. But does it not entitle the member so rising to debate it to the floor upon it when the resolution is taken up by the House?

Mr. RUSK. It has not yet been taken up.

Mr. HALE. No; and if the House does not take it up then the question will not arise.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. In order to carry the resolution over the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] had to be recognized as being upon the floor and ready to debate the resolution. Thereupon, being so recognized by the Speaker and holding the floor for debate, under the rule the resolution went over.

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair decides that that is a manner of objection provided for by the rules. It would operate most unjustly if it took off the floor the gentleman who introduced the resolution under the rules, without first giving him control of the resolution.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. He would have control of the resolution by himself rising to debate it or by moving the previous question and having that sustained. But failing to do that, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] is entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so. The Chair holds that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LE MOYNE,] who introduced the resolution, has a right to be recognized if the House shall determine now to consider it.

Mr. HOSKINS. The gentleman from Illinois upon introducing the resolution took his seat. Thereupon I rose to debate the resolution, and, had the resolution not gone over under the rule, I would have debated it at that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] desired the resolution to be considered and acted on at that time.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. And therefore he lost his right to the floor when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] rose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so, because the rising of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] is a form of objection provided for by the rule, and upon that objection the resolution went over. All the practice of the House goes to show that the member who introduces the proposition should primarily have the control of it until the House by a majority vote takes it out of his control.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Or until he demands a vote upon it, when he loses his right to the floor.

Mr. HALE. The mover of the resolution introduced it and asked that it be passed. He does not from his action presumably desire to debate it. But the rule provides that if any one rises to debate the resolution it goes over. Now, the member introducing this resolution indicated no desire to debate it; on the contrary, he wanted it adopted; and, having introduced it and resumed his seat, the gentleman from New York rose to insist on a privilege which the rules give of debating the resolution. He is the initial party on that consideration; he is the member who indicated a desire to debate it. Therefore I would ask who the Chair decides was upon the floor when this resolution went over?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from New York was on the floor under the right given him by the rule to make objection. In further reply to the gentleman from Maine, the Chair would say that never within his recollection has the control of a resolution or bill or report been taken out of the hands of the gentleman introducing it until a majority of the House has acted adversely to him. It would be a very arbitrary rule to allow a single member upon his own motion, without any action of the House, to take from the control of another member a proposition which he introduces.

Mr. HALE. Of course my theory proceeds upon the assumption that the gentleman from Illinois who introduced the resolution had surrendered the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read a passage from the Manual bearing upon this question:

By parliamentary courtesy the member upon whose motion a subject is brought before the House is first entitled to the floor.

This is a point which appears to admit of very little doubt.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But, Mr. Speaker, when the member introducing the proposition demands a vote, as was the case yesterday on a bill then before the House, he loses the right to the floor. The gentleman from New York could only be recognized, not for objection, but for debate. Under the rule a member rising to debate a proposition does not object; he simply rises to debate it, and holding the floor for that purpose, the rule carries the resolution over.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I submit that debate is not in order. The House was dividing; there was no quorum; and tellers were appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. A division had been demanded and tellers ordered. The tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 84.

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1876.

The SPEAKER. The next resolution lying over under this order of business will now be read.

The Clerk read the following resolution, offered on Friday last by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to report a joint resolution providing for the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1876.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This order of business being concluded, reports from committees are now in order.

W. L. ROBINSON.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 747) to re-imburse W. L. Robinson, late postmaster at Galesville, New York, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I ask that this bill be placed on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that upon the demand of any member a bill reported adversely must under the practice of the House go to the Private Calendar. Although there is no specific rule directing this course, it is in accordance with the usage of the House heretofore.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I so understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not overrule the decision of his predecessors in this particular. The bill will be placed upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask that the report be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

BRIG A. S. PENNELL.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the brig A. S. Pennell to the City of Moule.

The bill was read. It provides that the owners of the brig A. S. Pennell, of Portland, Maine, be authorized to change her name to the City of Moule; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue a register for the same.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEREFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DICKSON SHINAULT.

Mr. HEREFORD also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-vessel at Wolf Trap light-station, in the State of Virginia.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the account of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-vessel at Wolf Trap light-station, in the State of Virginia, and allow him the sum of $120, being the amount due him as salary for the first quarter of the year 1861.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the time, and passed.

Mr. HEREFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOONER CARTERET.

Mr. FELTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1874) granting a new register to the schooner Undine, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a new register or other marine papers, under the name of the Undine, to the schooner or vessel now or lately called the Minnie, now being rebuilt at Hollywood, North Carolina, upon the surrender of her former papers, and filing a carpenter's certificate with the collector of Beaufort, North Carolina, to the effect that said vessel has been substantially built as new under the authority of the act.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In the fifth line, strike out "Undine" and insert "Carteret."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FELTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the title will be amended to agree with the bill as amended.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, and to move non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate thereto. The amendments of the Senate are very long, and if it is deemed necessary I will state their substance. The amendments of the Senate were not considered in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but were objected to for the reason that they were general legislation and ought not to be attached to a post-route bill. As the House is well aware, it is quite unusual to place general legislation upon such post-route bills. If the amendments are to be passed at all they should be passed in another form.

The amendments of the Senate make appropriations establishing fast mails between New York, Chicago, and other points. They also re-enact the franking privilege, including the franking of letters as well as of documents. They also give the First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General authority to sign contracts, bonds, &c., coming under their special consideration without reference, as the law now is, to the Postmaster-General. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the amendments of the Senate will be read, or, if they are not read, I hope they will be ordered to be printed, and their consideration postponed until we shall have them on our desks as printed.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. These amendments of the Senate contain general legislation, and it has been the practice to omit altogether from post-route bills general legislation of every character. For that reason the committee have recommended non-concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. We have not been able on this side to hear the gentleman from Missouri, and I hope he will state exactly the substance of these amendments.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the bill which went from the House was the usual post-route bill. It passed at the last session of Congress, and went to the Senate, where a number of amendments embracing general legislation were added to it. One of the amendments appropriates $350,000 or $400,000 for the purpose of establishing fast mails between the cities of New York, Chicago, and Saint Louis, New York and New Orleans, and other points in the country. Another amendment re-establishes or re-enacts the franking privilege, including the franking of letters as well as of documents by members of the Senate and House of Representatives and the heads of the different Departments. Another amendment gives authority to the First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General to sign all contracts coming within the purview of their separate departments without being signed by the Postmaster-General, as the law now requires.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have moved non-concurrence, simply upon the ground that these amendments were entirely out of place upon a post-route bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Do the committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendment establishing the fast mails?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. They recommend non-concurrence in all the amendments. The committee were of the opinion that these subjects should be more properly embraced in another bill, and recommended non-concurrence, because it has been held to be impolitic and improper for amendments embracing general legislation to be attached to the usual post-route bill.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PINKNEY ROLLINS.

Mr. HANCOCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of Pinkney Rollins, with an adverse report; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JOHN F. SUTHERLIN & BROTHER.

Mr. HANCOCK also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3256) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to settle the claim or account of the United States against said John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana, distillers, upon the following terms, to wit: Their survey shall be fixed from the beginning at two gallons and seventy-five hundredths of a gallon of proof spirits per bushel of grain; and on that measurement of capacity their accounts shall be settled and adjusted. No damages or interest shall be charged against them in adjusting their accounts.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the report accompanying that bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It appears that in 1872, when the Messrs. Sutherlin erected their distillery, they were farmers, residing in Parke County, in the State of Indiana; had no experience as distillers of spirits from grain, but had some as distillers of brandy from apples and peaches. They are represented as illiterate, but honest and well-meaning men. Their distillery was surveyed on the 17th day of June, 1872, by General Frank White, then assessor of that district, and his deputy, Fred. W. Stokes. The capacity of the distillery was put at 58½ bushels of grain daily, to yield 3½ gallons proof-spirits per bushel, which would make the yield 204¾ gallons per day. At the time General White made the survey he says he was of the opinion, under his instructions from Washington, that he could not make the survey less than 3½ gallons per bushel, although he was of the opinion at the time of making the survey that the distillery would not make a yield of 3½ gallons of proof spirits from each bushel of grain used, on account of the machinery of the distillery being defective. In the written application of said Sutherlins, which is under oath, they state positively that they were not aware of the fact that, if they made less than 80 per cent. of proof spirits of their surveyed capacity, they were subject to an assessment to make up the difference between 80 per cent. of their capacity and the actual amount of spirits produced. They supposed that all the Government wanted from them was the tax of 70 per cent. on the gallon for all proof spirits distilled by them.

Their first mash was prepared on the 6th of September, 1872, and the first distillation was made on the 9th. During the months of September and October, under the survey above named, they run their distillery for 41 days. During that time, according to their survey, they ought to have produced, counting 3½ gallons to the bushel, 7,371 gallons; 80 per cent. of that amount would be 5,896.80. The amount actually produced was 2,516.05; difference between 80 per cent. and amount actually produced was 3,380.75.

The tax assessed against them on the 3,380.75 gallons of deficiency, at 70 cents per gallon, amounts to the sum of $2,366 42.

During this 41 days the facts show that there were five mashes that were thrown out to the hogs because spirits could not, for some unaccountable reason, be made from them. These five mashes, according to the capacity of the distillery, counting them at 80 per cent. of that capacity, ought to have produced 1,023.75 gallons of spirits.

During the month of November, 1872, they run their distillery for six days, to-wit, from November 25 to November 30, both inclusive.

During that time they ought to have produced, according to the survey, 1,228½ gallons. 80 per cent. of that would be 982.80 gallons. They actually made 780 gallons. Difference between 80 per cent. and amount produced, 202.80 gallons.

Deficiency tax on that amount, at 70 cents per gallon, would make $141.96; but from some cause the deficiency tax assessed against them on the above amount is put at $43.13. But since that time the Internal Revenue Department has abated of that amount all except the $141.96, which still remains against them.

The amount of the assessment made against them up to December, 1872, amounted to $2,513.38, allowing the abatement made by the Department as above shown. On the 31st day of December, 1872, a new survey was made and the capacity placed at 3 gallons per bushel, instead of 3½ as per first survey. On the 30th day of January, 1874, a new survey was made and fixed at 2.75 gallons per bushel. Since that time the distillery has run at the capacity fixed by last survey.

The sworn statements of the gaugers, store-keepers, and distiller, which accompany their application for an abatement of the above tax, show that the deficiency in the yield of the said distillery was not on account of any improper conduct of the said Sutherlins or any of their employés, but was produced by causes that no one connected with the distillery upon the part of the Government can account for or explain.

The statement of General White, the present collector of that district, shows that said distillery has been operated at a loss to said Sutherlins; that they are poor men, and that for the Government to force them to pay said deficiency with its interest and costs, which now amounts to near $4,000, would break up the Sutherlins and their securities.

The affidavits of the Government officers and the letter of the present collector show that the tax was paid to the Government on all the spirits produced at said distillery at the time said deficiency occurred, and that said Sutherlins have lost heavily in trying to operate said distillery, after all their efforts and losses, as shown by the evidence accompanying the application for an abatement of said tax.

The committee feel that it would be a very great hardship on the Sutherlins to now undertake to collect from them this deficiency, as above stated, and by so doing ruin them and their securities financially.

The Government to settle with them from the beginning upon the basis of the last survey, to wit, 2.75 gallons of proof-spirits per bushel of grain, and not charging them with any interest or damage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is recognized for the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask that by unanimous consent a change be made in the order of the House a short time ago in regard to the post-route bill. There has been a misunderstanding in regard to the non-concurrence in the Senate amendments. It was my intention to move concurrence in those amendments of the Senate which established post-routes and non-concurrence in those amendments which were alluded to in my remarks. I ask that by unanimous consent the order of the House be so changed as that the non-concurrence shall only apply to the amendments that I indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN. The order should be made to concur distinctly in the amendments of the Senate establishing post-routes and to non-concur in all others.

Mr. KASSON. There is no objection to that.

By unanimous consent the change indicated was made in the order of the House.

WILLIAM H. GRAY.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1463) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Private Secretary.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole be limited to one-half hour.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. COX in the chair) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, and by order of the House all general debate on the bill is limited to one-half hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, in the last session of Congress during the pendency and discussion of the post-office appropriation bill the subject of the mode of compensation of railroads for carrying the United States mails was discussed; and subsequently during the session I believe it was understood that a joint committee of the two Houses should be appointed to adopt some mode that would be equitable and just for compensating these roads. I understand that joint committee was appointed to examine that subject during the recess of Congress and make a report. I see that the bill is reported without reference to any suggestions from that committee, and perhaps their report may not have been made.

Mr. BLOUNT. It has not.

Mr. REAGAN. The necessity for the adoption of some rule different from any that now prevails for the compensation of these roads to reach the ends of justice and fairness and equity as to the roads themselves, and to reduce public expenditures, it seemed to me was eminently necessary. I do not rise for the purpose of offering amendments to bring up that subject now, but simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that after the increase of the cost of this branch of the service by the act of 1873, which was an increase by that single act of about $1,800,000, there was a slight reduction made by the arrangement adopted on the report of a committee of conference between the two Houses at the last session; but having examined this subject of the increase of the cost of that service by the act of 1873, it seemed to me that it was a high duty devolved upon the Appropriation Committee to have made provision for a more equitable mode of compensating the railroads and for a reduction of the expenditures in this respect.

The appropriation now proposed for the cost of railroad transportation is about the same, perhaps a few thousand dollars less than, it was last year. I have before me a pamphlet purporting to be letters to the Postmaster-General by Mr. James N. Davis, of the Post-Office Department, whom I do not know, in which there is a very full discussion of that subject; and there are formulated in some four or five sections a plan for compensating the railroads for this class of service, which the writer states would be more equitable as among the railroads, and save the Government nearly $2,000,000 of expense annually. I regret exceedingly that this pamphlet had not fallen into the hands of the committee, for, so far as I am able to comprehend this subject, the discussion of it there is more clear and more satisfactory than any I have seen, and in truth I must say, not knowing the author of the pamphlet, the only intelligent discussion of the subject I have seen, in which he proposes, as a mode of equalizing the amounts paid for the service according to the value of the service rendered to the Government, to adopt a compound mode of compensation, partly by the weight of the mails and partly by the space of cars occupied. I regret, if I have rightly understood the effect of the propositions contained in these letters, that they have not come before the committee, so that the committee might have examined them and seen if the conclusions they present are of a character that would work a measure of eminent justice in fixing the equities among the railroads as to the value of the service performed, and effecting a considerable saving of expense to the Government. I call attention to this, because I am unwilling that this bill should go by without attention being called to so important a feature in it. But I do not propose without the sanction of the committee, at this time, to undertake to offer amendments that would produce the effect which, it seems to me, ought to have been produced by this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee have had occasion, or a portion of the members of the committee, to examine the views referred to by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] in regard to fixing the mode of compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of mails. The effort made during the last session to adopt a system somewhat similar to that referred in the pamphlet mentioned by the gentleman from Texas failed on account of the absence of definite information on the subject.

And in lieu of the attempt on the part of the House to adopt a new basis of compensation, we finally agreed simply to reduce the compensation for transportation of mails by railroad companies 10 per cent. upon the amount of compensation allowed by the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, and 20 per cent. upon the amount allowed by the act to the railroad companies to which land grants had been made, referring the general subject of fixing the basis of compensation to railroads for transportation of the mails to a commission which has not yet made a report. I understand that that commission has held sessions in all the leading cities in the United States. But a short time since, I noticed that they were upon the Pacific Coast; I believe they have now returned. But I am very confident that the information they will be able to furnish will not be so collated, arranged, and understood during this present session of Congress as to justify any attempt to adopt a new system of compensation at the present session.

From the report of the Postmaster-General we learn that the effect of the change of rates of compensation to railroads made at the last session of Congress was a reduction of the pay to railroads, independent of land-grant roads, amounting to $726,187, and to the land-grant roads a reduction of $260,714; making the entire reduction, which may be made available for the coming fiscal year as well as for the present, of $986,901.

There is this additional fact to be considered, that contracts now existing, and which will expire from time to time, prevent the full effect of that reduction being felt for the present fiscal year. Nor will the full effect of the reduction be felt next year, for there are contracts representing something over $2,000,000 a year still in existence, and which will expire from time to time during the next two years.

If gentlemen will refer to the appendix to the report of the Postmaster-General, page 8, they will see that the cost of transporting the mails by railroads for the last fiscal year was $9,543,134. That amount will be reduced by the reduction effected by the legislation of last Congress by the sum of $986,901, leaving $8,556,233 as the amount that will be expended during the next fiscal year, in the absence of any increase in the cost of railroad transportation of mails or increase of the service.

I suppose, however, that there will be some increase. The Committee on Appropriations by the pending bill proposed to appropriate $9,000,000, being only $100,000 less than the appropriation for the current fiscal year. The better opinion is that under no circumstances will the increased cost of railroad transportation of mails exceed $8,800,000. I think, therefore, that the amount proposed by this bill, $9,000,000, is about $200,000 more than will be actually required.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to ask the gentleman what difference, if any, there is between the estimates of the Committee on Appropriations of the receipts of the Post-Office Department for the coming fiscal year and the estimates of the Department? Last year, I believe, there was a difference, and quite a marked one.

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimate of the Department of the receipts for the coming fiscal year——

Mr. GARFIELD. I mean the whole receipts of the Department. The Department has made, in the aggregate, an estimate of how much it expects to receive in the way of revenue. I desire to inquire if the Committee on Appropriations have treated that as the basis of their action in this bill or whether they have changed the basis by estimating that there will be more revenue than the Department estimates?

Mr. HOLMAN. We accept the estimates of the Post-Office Department. At the last session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations insisted that the revenues of the Post-Office Department would exceed by some $900,000 the estimates submitted by the Postmaster-General at the commencement of the session. The views of the Committee on Appropriations have been proved to be substantially correct, for the receipts have been very materially increased. Still we take the estimate of the Department, $30,645,165, as the probable revenues of the Post-Office Department for the next fiscal year; and we reach the deficit upon that basis.

A single remark further and I will then yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WALDRON,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations. The Post-Office Department seems to assume, it does assume in the report of the Postmaster-General, and especially in the report of the superintendent of railroad transportation, that the reductions made by Congress at its last session will not be adhered to. Now, I think that the House will have no occasion to recede from the measures it adopted at the last session upon this subject. On the contrary, I think that the reductions then made were very moderate indeed, considering the general shrinkage of values throughout the country.

Mr. WALDRON. The bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations for the support of the Post-Office Department during the next fiscal year appropriates $1,300,000 less than the corresponding bill of last year, and it appropriates $3,700,000 less than called for by the estimates of the Department. It does this, too, in the face of the natural increase of the service year by year.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations I have given some little attention to the details of this bill. While I concur with the majority of the committee in many of the reductions from the estimates that this bill proposes, yet as one of the minority of the committee I differ with the majority as to some of these reductions, believing that the majority have reduced the appropriations to an amount that will be inadequate for the efficient working of the postal service.

During the last session of this Congress this post-office appropriation bill was the occasion of a long and earnest discussion in the committee and in the House. I have no desire to re-open that discussion. I shall content myself, as some of these items are reached in their order, by proposing amendments which in my judgment will be for the interest of an efficient postal service.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to add one word to what I have said about the cost of railroad transportation of the mails. That item of cost is stated at $9,000,000. But there are other items. There is one for railway post-office clerks, $1,125,000, and one for route agents, $845,000; making the total cost of that branch of the service $11,970,000, instead of $9,000,000. I simply desire to add this statement, because it ought to appear as showing the enormous extent to which the cost of this branch of the service has been carried.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concur very fully in the views of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as to the excessive cost of the transportation of the mails by the railroads. And I think the views expressed in the pamphlet to which he has referred, by a gentleman well informed of the operations of the Post-Office Department, are undoubtedly correct, and that the expense of transporting the mails by railroads ought to be reduced at least two millions of dollars below even the amount which we propose to appropriate for the next fiscal year. There is no branch of the public service in which there has been such an increase of expense as in this branch of the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, the transportation of mails by railroads.

That is in consequence of the powerful influences brought to bear upon the Post-Office Department. These railroads exert a power which is compact and consolidated. They are exacting in their demands, and have steadily sought year by year to obtain an increase of compensation until the last session of Congress. I indulge the hope that the next Congress which shall consider the report of this special commission will find it entirely compatible with the public interest to reduce the expenditures for the transportation of mails by railroads to not exceeding seven millions of dollars per annum, which I think will be a very ample compensation for the service.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate upon this bill is closed, and it will be now read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1878, out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of said Department, in conformity to the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

Office of the Postmaster-General:

For mail depredations and special agents, $121,500; and not exceeding $7,500 of this amount may be expended for fees to United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and counsel necessarily employed by special agents of the Post-Office Department, subject to approval by the Attorney-General.

Mr. WALDRON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$121,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000." I desire merely to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the expenditures of the Department for this branch of the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, were $165,000 and the appropriation made last year for this purpose $150,000. There are forty-three agents paid under this appropriation, and their salaries and expenses during the last fiscal year amounted to $142,000. The effect of reducing this item of appropriation can only be to cripple the Department in its effort to detect and punish fraud and crimes, and I do not believe that is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. In reference to this reduction I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations have seen fit to reduce the number of special agents to seventy-five. The total number of arrests by all these agents during the last year was two hundred and ninety-one, or about eight arrests to each State on an average. They have some other duties to perform connected with the operations of the Departments, but this is the main portion of their business.

The Committee on Appropriations were satisfied that one agent for each State was enough; not only that, but judging from the amount of work which is reported to have been done by them it is more than enough. With a view of reducing the expenditures of the Government wherever it could be done, we have adopted this course in reference to this branch of the service. We have not sought to look backward and see what has been done for the purpose of imitating it; but wherever there have been excesses we have sought promptly to correct them. We are satisfied that not only will the service not be impaired but it will be improved by this reduction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that in a general way the Committee on Appropriations, not only at this session but last session, have reached the conclusion that an allowance for special agents on the basis of about one for each State in the Union—thirty-eight in the aggregate—is very ample. While in some cases more than one agent may be required for a State, yet in other cases a single agent may be sufficient for several States. Putting together the compensation and expenses of these agents (as officials of the Post-Office Department they travel on free passes) the committee thought that $3,000 for each would be a very ample allowance, making the amount $114,000. Adding to that $7,500 for what the committee regard as a very questionable item—allowances to attorneys, marshals, clerks, and other officers connected with the Federal judiciary, the aggregate appropriation is $121,500.

I believe there is a general impression on the part of gentlemen who have examined this subject that an unnecessary number of these special agents are now employed. The whole number of special agents employed during the last fiscal year was sixty-two. The number now provided for by this appropriation is forty three. The committee propose to make provision for thirty-eight, unless the Post-Office Department thinks proper to increase the number by correspondingly diminishing the compensation; for certainly $3,000 is a very large compensation, and greatly beyond the average pay received by other employés of the Government for services of similar character.

Mr. FOSTER. All that is desired, I suppose, in regard to this expenditure is to see that the Department has the necessary help to protect the people from crimes against the postal laws. This bill provides for thirty-eight special agents; and as there are between thirty-six and thirty-seven thousand post-offices in the country, it allows one special agent for about one thousand post-offices. Is it possible for one special agent to take care in this respect of one thousand post-offices?

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman wish the House to understand that these agents are obliged to go to each of the several post-offices?

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir; I do not understand that to be the fact.

Mr. CLYMER. Does not the gentleman know that most of this labor is really done by the postmasters in the large towns; that they supervise the offices in surrounding districts?

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir, I do not know that to be the fact.

Mr. CLYMER. That is the practice.

Mr. FOSTER. With all due deference to the chairman of the committee and the subcommittee, I think I have given this subject more special attention than they have; for I do not believe they have carefully gone into this question; they have not had before them the special agents in charge. I make the statement that under this proposition we allow but one agent for one thousand post-offices. I think the bare statement of that fact is sufficient without argument to show that the number here provided for is inadequate. I do not propose, however, to make any factious opposition. I merely make these remarks to sustain the Post-Office Department in its estimate that $150,000 is the least that will suffice to meet the needs of the service in this respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of being a little out of order I wish to say that the post-office appropriation bill as passed by the House at the last session proposed to appropriate $110,000 as against $121,500 proposed to be appropriated by this bill. It was then urged, however, that from some unaccountable cause, but as was alleged according to all experience, more depredations were committed during the year of a presidential canvass than during other years.

Mr. FOSTER. That was on account of the reform tendencies of the democratic party!

Mr. HOLMAN. The argument was pressed very vehemently. Statistics were furnished to show the absolute necessity for an increased number of special agents during the presidential year; and, strangely enough, the bill did not go through at the last session without a recognition of that fact; so that the appropriation as finally made was $150,000. But, happily for the country, the next fiscal year is not a year for the election of President; so that I think we can very safely, consistently with every interest, reduce this amount to $121,500.

The amendment of Mr. WALDRON was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,290,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to cause a careful inquiry to be made into the rates of compensation now paid to clerks in post-offices, with a view to a more equitable adjustment and reduction thereof: Provided, That such adjustment shall in no case involve an increase over and above the present aggregate compensation as provided in this act.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. By instruction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the word "two" in line 34, and inserting "five;" so as to read:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,590,000.

Mr. Chairman, the amount expended by the Post-Office Department for clerk hire during the year ending June 30, 1875, was $3,414,811.26. The amount expended for this purpose during the last fiscal year was $3,480,730.45. The estimate of the expenditure this year is $3,700,000. The amount recommended in this bill to be appropriated for the next fiscal year is $3,290,000, which I believe is the amount of the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

Now, it will be recollected by the committee that the salaries of postmasters were very materially changed by the legislation of the first session. Salaries that had previously been about $1,500 were slightly increased; while those ranging from $2,000 to $4,000 were very largely diminished. The result is that by cutting off this allowance for clerk hire the candle will be burning at both ends. In many parts of the country, postmasters who heretofore received from $2,000 to $3,000 a year are cut down below $2,000. Now under the law there is no authority to allow clerk hire to postmasters getting less than $2,000 salary, though such postmasters may have an allowance for separating the mails, provided there is any necessity for such an allowance. So that in many important points, for instance in my own State of Illinois, where postmasters get less than two thousand dollars, having got twenty-three hundred and twenty-eight hundred dollars heretofore, there can be no allowance for clerk hire. In some places of that kind they have very heavy duties to perform in separating mails, as, for instance, at the crossing of important railroads.

Now when I go and ask for an allowance of that kind in behalf of these postmasters at the hands of the Postmaster-General, he at once admits the allowance ought to be made but says there is no money out of which the payment can be made. Therefore I think it is right and proper that this allowance should be increased. In my opinion, as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it should be increased to $3,700,000, the amount estimated for by the Department, but after a very full and thorough consideration given to this question the majority of that committee thought it ought to be increased to $3,500,000 instead of $3,290,000.

A MEMBER. Was that a unanimous vote?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes; it was a unanimous vote on the part of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and in compliance with the instructions of that committee I move to make the sum $3,500,000 instead of $3,290,000, and hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations are opposed to this amendment. The question has been carefully considered. It was discussed at the last session and the very same reasoning was then urged for increasing it which is now adduced by the gentleman from Illinois.

Doubtless it is true that in some sections of the country there have not been and there is not sufficient clerical force. But during the discussion of the last post-office appropriation bill we were fully satisfied there were other sections of the country where the clerical force was entirely too large, and that with a proper adjustment the money appropriated for this purpose was ample to provide for the wants of the service.

Instances were given where excessive allowances were made; where the clerical force at some offices was ample to do all the work without any assistance from the postmasters themselves. Various members of the House informed the committee that such was the condition of affairs in their districts. Therefore we determined that we would adhere to this reduction.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him whether the Committee on Appropriations have made any calculation for any increase of this character of service under the Post-Office Department? I notice that the committee in the last appropriation bill made precisely the same appropriation that is now asked for.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to know if the Committee on Appropriations have made any calculation for any increase of service, and whether in case of increase of service a larger appropriation will not be required for next year than was required for the present fiscal year?

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as that matter is concerned, there has been at the same time a decrease in the value of labor of every kind; and there is no reason why it should not be felt in the Post-Office Department and in all other Departments of this Government, which are but burdens upon the people, as in any other service. The Committee on Appropriations are determined the people shall have the benefit of this condition of affairs.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. But I was speaking in reference to the condition of the force.

Mr. BLOUNT. I so understood, and my reply was with reference to that, and that, while there may have been some slight increase, nevertheless this fund, in view of the reduced price of labor, would go quite as far as the service required.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move pro forma to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the last appropriation bill passed on this subject appropriated for this service $3,292,000. The item occupied a very considerable time in its consideration before the conference committee. The Postmaster-General in his annual report for the last year, not for the present one, called the attention of Congress to the growing tendency to increased expense in this particular branch of the service, and spoke of the importance of devising some method, if possible, by which the postmasters themselves should devote themselves to their duties, instead of the entire duty of the carrying on of the post-offices of the Government being remitted to the clerks allowed to the respective offices by the Post-Office Department.

There are two considerations which induce the committee to report this provision just as it stands, appropriating for the next year the same amount appropriated for this year. The first is that there have been manifestly a steady shrinkage of values in this country since that appropriation was made and a reduction in the compensation for service in all branches of industries in this country much greater, as we think, than the necessity for any increase in this particular branch of the service. Secondly, if possible, by reducing the amount of the appropriation to a reasonable sum, the object was, in these offices, by the aid of the clerks assigned to the postmasters, that the postmasters themselves should administer the affairs of their offices well and efficiently. The object was not to appropriate so large a sum as to bring about the old order of things, when the whole business was remitted to the clerks, while the postmasters themselves, with their handsome salaries, were relieved from the performance of any duty, throwing the entire labor, and in fact the entire responsibility, of the post-offices upon the clerks furnished by assignment from the Post-Office Department.

We think, Mr. Chairman, upon every ground, Congress is entirely justified in continuing the appropriations for the next fiscal year to the same sum appropriated for this year, that is to say, $3,290,000. I think that sum is ample.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, there were—ayes 76, noes 67; no quorum voting.

The Chairman, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 89.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For payment to letter-carriers, $1,750,000. It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to carefully inquire into the number of carriers employed in the several cities where the free delivery of mail matter is established, and to reduce the number of carriers and the number of deliveries of the mails by such carriers for each day to the reasonable requirements of the public service.

Mr. STONE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$1,750,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000,000.

The object of this amendment is to place sufficient means in the hands of the Postmaster-General to carry out the provisions of section 3866 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General, and shall not exceed $800 per annum; but on satisfactory evidence of diligence, fidelity, and experience, he may increase their salary to any sum not exceeding $1,000 a year each; and in San Francisco, California, he may pay such additional salaries to carriers as will secure the services of competent persons.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, the appropriation was $1,900,000; and the expenses of that branch were $1,980,795.02. The amount asked for by the Postmaster-General for this service this year is $2,100,000. This branch of the Department is constantly increasing in all the large cities of the United States, and I should think that the amount asked for by the Postmaster-General is not at all too much, when we take into consideration that the amount appropriated for the last fiscal year had to be exceeded $80,795.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this amendment ought to be adopted. The Committee on Appropriations, I believe, is quite unanimous in the belief that the appropriation of $1,750,000 is sufficient for this service. There has been no increase of free-delivery offices during the past fiscal year, and we are not informed that there has been any increase since the close of the last fiscal year. The cost to the people of the United States of free delivery in the various cities, leaving out the three cities New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, is nearly half a million dollars over and above the entire revenue resulting from the free delivery; that is to say, it is not simply the additional one cent that is taken into the account in making up the amount of revenues resulting from this system in the cities, but the entire local postage of two cents is taken into account; and yet, allowing for all the cities where the free-delivery system prevails the entire postage required to be affixed to mail matter, leaving out the three cities I have named, there is a deficit of largely over $400,000 of expenses over and above the revenues resulting from the system. If you take the cities New York, Boston, and Philadelphia in account, then there is about $80,000 more of receipts than expenses; that is to say, receipts growing out of the local postage of these cities. I see that the Post-Office Department makes it a matter of some boast that this system taken as an entirety is not a source of expense; that notwithstanding we lose all of the local postage the revenues resulting from these three great cities, New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, make up the deficit and a little more. But on that principle——

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if this service is not increasing, instead of decreasing, all the time?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not materially increasing. As I remarked a moment ago, there was no new office established last year, and we are not informed of any new offices having been established since the close of the last fiscal year. The system becomes very oppressive where you extend it to cities having a population of less than 50,000 inhabitants. Perhaps for cities of greater population it is well enough; but when you extend it to cities below that population, in order that the people may not have to go to their offices to get their mail matter, you impose a hardship upon the whole people of this country. In other words, leaving out the great commercial centers of the east, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, the industries of this country are compelled to bear a taxation of nearly half a million of dollars to furnish these facilities in cities where persons can go without embarrassment or trouble to the office to get their mail matter. I admit that in great cities like New York, where, without this method, great bodies of people would have to come together to get their mail matter, this system is admirable. But in cities of thirty or forty thousand inhabitants, where the expense is four or five times as much as the revenues, it works an actual hardship.

My friend from Saint Louis [Mr. STONE] represents a great city; and to give that city the benefit of this free-delivery system the people of this country are taxed many thousands of dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. Sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; the people of this country are taxed $60,000 to bring the mail matter right to the homes of the citizens of that city, while a large portion of the people of the United States have to travel many miles to get their mails. Let me put the case to my friend from Saint Louis. He insists upon taxing the people of this country $60,000 to bring the mail matter of the citizens of Saint Louis right to their doors, while the great body of the people upon whom that tax falls must go miles for the purpose of getting their mail matter. I will not debate the question, however, as to the large cities Saint Louis, Chicago, or Louisville, or the great cities of the east; but what I do protest against is the extension of this system beyond what is fair and reasonable, and the Committee on Appropriations, I think, with great unanimity believe that $1,750,000, economically applied, are ample to carry into effect this branch of the service.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose, in furtherance of what has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, of calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that during the last session of this Congress the following paragraph was made a part of the appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department:

It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to carefully inquire into the number of carriers employed in the several cities where the free delivery of mail matter is established, and reduce the number of carriers and the number of deliveries of the mails by such carriers for each day to the reasonable requirements of the public service.

This should have been the course pursued by the Postmaster-General, for it was evidently the purpose of Congress; it was evidently the purpose of this legislation. It has not been done at all. On the contrary, there has been an increase of the number of this class of employés in the service. I trust that after the long discussion of this matter in this House at the last session of Congress, when we had ample time to consider the subject, when the policy of this Congress was fully ascertained and put in the form of legislation, in this short session, and in this hurried manner we will not seek to undo what we then did with deliberation.

Furthermore, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the provision of the Revised Statutes which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] read and accompanied by remarks which were calculated to mislead the House. He stated that he desired that the amount of money appropriated for this purpose should be enlarged to a given sum in order that the Postmaster-General might carry out the provision of the Revised Statutes which he read; the idea being that in that provision the salaries were absolutely fixed, and that by reason of a deficiency in the amount of money appropriated, and which the Postmaster-General ought to have had, he could not pay to these men what they were by law entitled to.

I will read, in order that it may be understood, the section of the Revised Statutes upon this subject:

SEC. 3865. Letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter, as frequently as the public convenience may require, at every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of its post-office; and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than twenty thousand within the delivery of its post-office.

Mr. STONE. It was the next section to which I referred.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will read what the gentleman read:

SEC. 3866. The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General and shall not exceed $800 per annum; but on satisfactory evidence of diligence, fidelity, and experience, he may increase their salary to any sum not exceeding $1,000 a year each; and in San Francisco, California, he may pay such additional salaries to carriers as will secure the services of competent persons.

Mr. STONE. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask him right there——

Mr. BLOUNT. In one moment I will. It is evident from the reading of this provision of the Revised Statutes that Congress did not fix the salaries of these letter-carriers, but merely limited the maximum amounts which the Postmaster-General might give, and nothing more. The gentleman seeks to make the House understand that the contrary is true and that their salaries are absolutely fixed by the Revised Statutes independent of the Postmaster-General or any other person.

Mr. STONE. Will the gentleman please tell me what amounts were paid to letter-carriers during the year ending June 30, 1876, under that very provision, the Postmaster-General having authority to appoint the necessary number?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not see how that can explain the statute; the words of the statute explain themselves. It simply gives a discretion to the Postmaster-General to fix the salaries, authorizes him to pay them up to a certain amount, but directing that he shall not go beyond that amount. The fact that he has paid them the full amounts that he was permitted to pay under the law does not make it the law that he cannot pay them less.

Mr. HALE. I think it likely that there are some portions of this bill where the service may be pinched a little in the appropriations contained in the bill. But upon this particular subject-matter I do not believe there should be any increase. It is a branch of the service that needs watching all the time instead of encouragement. In fact the original object of the letter-carrier free-delivery system in cities has been entirely traveled away from, and it has become a matter of competition on the part of small cities which have ample accommodations in a single post-office to which the inhabitants can go for their mails; it has become a matter of competition on their part to get this free-delivery system extended to them, when it was never intended originally that such should be the action of the Department.

Strictly speaking, and carefully distributing the public revenues, my theory has always been that the free-delivery system should be established only in cities so large that the people cannot be accommodated at a single post-office. When a city becomes so large that the post-office avenues will be choked and gorged, and the inhabitants cannot promptly receive their mails, then as a part of the postal system they should be relieved by a free delivery. But when you apply it to cities of thirty or forty thousand or even fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants, you are taxing all the people for the purpose of giving a luxury, not a necessity, to a few. I do not believe that the letter-carrier free-delivery system ought to be applied to any place having less than 100,000 inhabitants.

But we have gone beyond that; and the result of this competition of some places, taxing the many for the benefit of the few, is that the service is all the time sought to be put up. Every year we are asked to enlarge the number of clerks or otherwise increase appropriations, because when a thing of this kind is started it aggrandizes itself. In the Committee on Appropriations we are constantly met by this demand. It has been the endeavor of the committee heretofore to counteract and check it—to keep it down as much as possible. Sometimes we have not had very good success in that direction. At the last session of Congress the committee made a fight on this subject-matter of the class of cities to which this free-delivery system should apply, and were beaten in the House—I thought wrongly. But we did not seek this year to renew that fight. Accepting the position which the House had taken, not seeking to change the law, we have still thought that it is within our province to curtail the appropriations as far as possible; and I believe that for the present system under the action already taken the appropriation is ample.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying a few words on this question I move a formal amendment to strike out the last word. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] ought to be satisfied with cutting down the appropriations in this bill $1,500,000 below the appropriations of last year. This reduction from last year would seem to satisfy any retrenchment necessary to be accomplished in one year. It is quite an advance on a bill of this nature. I think these gentlemen are generous enough to perceive that at the last session some few retrenchments may have been made without proper consideration. We might perhaps reform the reform a little, so as to give adequate compensation to employés of the Government who may have been underpaid.

These letter-carriers are now very inadequately paid. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] well states the great necessity of this system in the large cities. It is a refinement of civilization. It is an indispensability, not only to the inhabitants of the city, but their correspondents outside. Even the smaller cities seek for this great convenience of letter delivery. But under the compensation as cut down on two occasions by the Postmaster-General under the orders of Congress in 1874 and in 1875, it will be almost impossible to have that prompt, efficient, and faithful service in this respect in our large cities which the public demand. I speak especially from my knowledge of the city of New York. In that city this service is very wearing and onerous. These men trudge from before daylight till late at night, fulfilling faithfully their trust to the people of that city and to the Government. During last summer some of them dropped dead in their tracks while engaged in the delivery and collection of letters.

They cannot maintain themselves decently on the salaries now given them under the orders of Congress; for Congress by reducing the appropriations has, in fact, ordered the Postmaster-General to reduce the salaries. I have here a letter from Postmaster-General Tyner, not complaining in any offensive sense of Congress, but putting the responsibility upon us, which no doubt the Committee on Appropriations will very gladly assume, of cutting down this very meritorious service so far as certain salaries are concerned. I submit for the information of the House this communication:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter of Joseph Cocks, a letter-carrier in the city of New York, asking that you shall pay some attention to the memorial which that class of employés in the New York post-office, as well as those in the city of Brooklyn, have recently forwarded to the Post-Office Department, praying that the salaries which they lately received, and which have more recently been reduced, shall be re instated.

In reply thereto I desire to put the Post-Office Department precisely right in this communication. The reduction in the appropriation for letter-carriers was made by Congress in opposition to the estimate of this Department, and against its protest. There was but one alternative under the law, either to reduce the number of letter-carriers or to reduce the compensation which they received. If the number were reduced the public service would necessarily have to suffer; but if the loss falls upon individuals, the public will not suffer. Hence I found it necessary either to reduce the salaries of these very faithful employés or create a deficiency in this appropriation. Under no circumstances while I am in charge of this Department shall a deficiency of this kind occur. I therefore beg that you, as an influential member of the House and as a leader of the majority, will consider so much of the prayer of the petitioners as is presented in Mr. Cocks's letter, namely: that justice requires that the appropriation shall be increased to such an extent as to enable the Postmaster-General to re instate the old salaries of letter-carriers, which, as you are aware, were low enough already.

Very truly yours,

JAS. N. TYNER,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. S. S. COX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In New York City these men are obliged to pay as rent $300 or $400 in even the worst parts of the city. They make their seven and eight deliveries and their twelve and fourteen collections daily. They go up into tenement houses of sometimes eight floors, some of them containing a thousand people. Yet in spite of the immense labor imposed upon them, they make their deliveries regularly; but it will be impossible to maintain that service in its present condition unless we allow the men a quid pro quo, a quantum meruit. They are not paid according to the rates paid to the higher class of skilled mechanical labor. Yet when on account of sickness they are unable to attend to their duties, they are obliged to pay for their substitutes, while at the same time they must pay for the medical service required.

The gentleman from Maine said something implying that, in respect to this free-delivery system, the cities were encroaching in some sense or becoming a tax and burden upon the country. Why, sir, in the city of New York the collections have exceeded, by $770,000, those of any other large city, while the service has cost less, in proportion to population, by $140,000, than the service in any other city.

Mr. Chairman, in justice to this class of our public servants the pay should be raised according to the recommendation of the postmaster at New York City and according to the recommendation of the Postmaster-General to the rate fixed by the bill which I had the honor the other day to introduce and have referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The basis of those rates is, in fact, the old compensation now fixed by law. This bill provides also that the length of service should be an element in the raising of salaries. Why not? Do not larger experience and established trustworthiness deserve proper recompense? I trust that when we come to that amendment, which will soon be offered, we shall give these men proper consideration.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the reduction proposed in this bill is not designed actually to accomplish the object attempted at the last session with reference to cutting down the letter-carrier service in the smaller cities; in other words, whether under the reduction proposed the Postmaster-General will be able to continue this system in the smaller cities where it is now established by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. My answer is that the expenditures made by this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, were $1,802,418.68.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the year ending June 30, 1875, the expenditures were $1,879,210.11; for the year ending June 30, 1876, $1,980,795.02. The number of free-delivery offices is not increasing, as my friend from Michigan is aware. Inasmuch as the number of employés will be substantially the same, the only effect of the reduction made in this bill upon the appropriation made last session for the present fiscal year will be to reduce the compensation of those employés. That is the effect. I do not pretend to deny it.

Mr. BANNING. How much will it reduce each of them?

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be a reduction of somewhere in the neighborhood of 8 per cent.

Mr. BANNING. Does the gentleman think that these men are overpaid now?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that all the employés of the Government are overpaid—all of them.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, from the answer given by the gentleman, that if the salaries can be reduced the letter-carrier system will be retained in the smaller cities; but if they cannot be reduced, it will necessarily be lopped off somewhere, either by cutting down the amount of labor performed in the larger cities or by withdrawing the letter-carrier service from some of the smaller cities. If I may judge from the argument of the gentleman from Maine, this would seem to be an effort to reach by indirection the precise question which was thoroughly discussed in this House at the last session, and I thought thoroughly decided. I hope that no effort will be made here to reduce expenditures in such a manner that this system shall be taken away from any city of the Union in which it has been established.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very apprehensive that after a residence of a very short time in this capital we lose sight of the real condition of affairs in this country. If I understand the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS,] he thinks that no reduction of salaries ought to be made; yet in view of the fact that there is no material increase, if any increase, going on at this time in the free-delivery system——

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I desire to correct the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield in a moment. The gentleman breaks in upon my sentence.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I have said nothing about the reduction of salaries; I spoke only of the reduction of service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad, then, that the gentleman is in favor of reduction of salaries, as I am; so that living in the capital does not, it appears, do my friend any harm.

But I was proceeding to say that notwithstanding the fact that within the last three years there has been no material increase in the number of free-delivery offices, no increase at all during the last year, and but slight growth in our cities during the last three years, the gentleman from Missouri actually proposes at this time, when we are getting down to "hard pan" as it were—when every industry of the country is oppressed, when wages in every field of employment are being reduced—the gentleman from Missouri actually proposes to increase the compensation of this class of employés of the Government above what it was in the years 1873 and 1874.

Why, sir, certainly the true basis of compensation by the Government is that which is paid in private employment for services requiring the same degree of integrity and ability; and I can assure the gentleman from Missouri that wages in this country have shrunk 50 per cent. within the last three years. I can point him to large sections of country in which laboring-men who have families dependent upon them, and who bear a portion of the burdens of taxation, are glad to receive a dollar a day as compensation for their services; and this too even in the case of skilled mechanics, many of whom are unable to obtain work even at that rate. Why, sir, you cannot pass along the streets of this prosperous city, where large sums of public money are being expended annually, without meeting men who ask you for work at the lowest possible price consistent with the support of their wives and children. And yet we propose to keep up the salaries of persons in Federal employment!

Gentlemen seem to forget the evil that is now pressing upon us. Was not one of the causes of the fearful contest through which we have recently passed, arraying citizen against citizen in fierce, bitter, unreasonable political conflict, the unworthy motive of venality growing out of our public employment? If this is to be a pure and honest Government—if places are to be sought and obtained through merit, from an honest desire for the welfare of the country and for honorable position—that end is to be secured, not by increasing the motives for fierce antagonism, but by reducing the compensation in public employment to that standard which prevails in the unofficial business of this country. Then we may indulge the hope that honorable ambition will alone inspire the citizen in seeking office under the Government.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. STONE. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from Indiana undertakes to say that my purpose in the proposition I have submitted is to increase official salaries. I deny the assertion. I undertake to say that Postmaster-General Jewell on the 1st of July, 1876, reduced the letter-carriers who had been receiving $1,000 to $900; and those who had been receiving $900 were cut down to $800, and so on. My purpose in offering the amendment was to restore the former salaries, not to increase them at all. I do not want to be placed in that position by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLOUNT. With reference to the amount of money proposed here to be appropriated I desire to call attention to the fact that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, the expenditures were $1,980,795.02. Our bill proposes an expenditure of $1,750,000. The question was asked awhile ago what was the per cent. of this reduction. It is less than 5 per cent.; and during the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill at the last session it seemed to be accepted by this House as a general principle in reference to all these salaries that we would reduce them to the extent of 10 per cent.

Mr. STONE. That reduction applied only to salaries above $1,200.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is a fact. Still it is also a fact that there has been a reduction in the compensation of labor throughout all the industries of the country, to a greater extent than the reduction here proposed.

If the statement made here as to the action of the Postmaster-General is correct—and I believe the statement conforms to the information furnished from that Department—then certainly, instead of carrying out the wishes of Congress, as shown in the last bill on this subject, he has extended the service. Instead of decreasing the service he has ignored the wishes of Congress on this point. And the only method within our power to control this matter is by reducing the amount we appropriate.

So far as regards the estimates of the Department we have become somewhat familiar with its demands upon this House. During the last Congress, in the mere matter of inland transportation, the Department called for over a million of dollars more than it could satisfy the committee the service required. As a result of that examination the Department made a supplementary communication to this House, correcting its previous error. In every direction, wherever money is to be had, there is an excessive demand. During the Forty-third Congress, as many of us are well aware, even gentlemen on the other side of the House in harmony with the Administration were compelled to restrain it within proper limits. It has never been the rule to yield an unquestioning assent to the demands of the Department; and shall we now, who profess to be acting in the interest of economy, who have been proclaiming our intention to reduce the expenditures of the Government, shall we appropriate without question whatever amount the Department may demand? To my mind the amount of money we propose to appropriate in this bill is ample.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] refers to the condition of labor in New York. Sir, there is labor outside of that city. There are burdens everywhere. New York and a few other cities of this country do not make up our vast population. It is in response to the demand of the great popular heart and in behalf of the interests of the people we are making these reductions.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to state in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the difficulty with the Post-Office Department arises from the policy which the Government has pursued in sending the mails wherever the pioneer goes. It does not arise from the city of New York or the State of New York, nor from the State of Pennsylvania, nor Massachusetts. And I am glad to say that in the last year or two it does not arise from the State of Illinois, and in no considerable extent from the State of Missouri. But it does arise from the mail service in the Western and Southern States.

I have not a single free-delivery office in my district. Indeed there is none in my portion of the State of Illinois.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Postmaster-General tells us in his report, in speaking of the free-delivery system, that "the general result of the service during the year is satisfactory. The postage on local matter exceeded the entire expenses $84,375.22."

I want to say that it comes with very bad grace from my friend from Indiana, representing one of the Western States—and with due deference to the gentleman from Georgia the same remark will apply to him—I say it comes with bad grace from such gentlemen to say that the people in the great cities in this country which do more to sustain the Post-Office Department than any other portion of the country shall not have the poor privilege of paying their letter-carriers a sum sufficient to carry on this system when the system is itself a source of revenue to the Department.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the amendment in line 12 by striking out "$1,750,000" and inserting "$1,900,000."

Mr. STONE. I am willing to accept that amendment as a modification of my own.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Missouri accepts my amendment, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations will be adopted.

Mr. COX. I should like to say a word on that amendment. I may have been misunderstood, and my friend may have been misunderstood, in saying that the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Appropriation Committee, would accept this amendment. I did not understand him to say that he would accept it, but that if our amendment is passed in any form, he would prefer it should be on the lower sum. I am ready to accept his statement in that way and hope the House will give us this $1,900,000. I think the Postmaster-General then can in some way or other make this service more remunerative in an honorable and equitable way to those who serve.

Mr. BANNING. That is the same sum we had last year.

Mr. COX. Yes; the same sum.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the argument of the gentleman from New York would apply with as much force to any reduction made by the committee as to this. I was of course gratified, and much gratified, at the eulogy he pronounced on the republican administration of the post-office in the city of New York; but, for all that, I am disposed on this proposition to agree with the committee. I think they are right. We have carried this free-delivery system too far, in my judgment. I agree with my colleague on the committee that in all cities under 100,000 this system should be abolished. I went through this subject with a great deal of care, and found that cities under 50,000 population cost the people in the neighborhood of $200,000 to $250,000 for continuing this free-delivery system, while in cities under 100,000 population it costs $100,000 more.

It occurs to me that the committee in this matter should be sustained. The argument of the gentleman from New York would be just as strong on any reduction made by the committee, as on this. His majority is large enough in the city of New York, without any desire to pander to this particular thing. I understand he has fifteen or twenty thousand majority, and there is no need to waste his breath on this class of officers of the Government.

As I have said, I think the committee ought to be sustained, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I am under a good deal of obligation to these men myself. They delivered my mail regularly during the canvass, and then voted solidly against me. While I am, like my friend from Indiana, in favor of economy, I think we should economize on the larger and not on the smaller salaries.

Mr. BLOUNT. We ought to economize all along the line.

Mr. BANNING. All along the line is not fair, when some men receive five to ten thousand dollars a year, and others only five or six hundred. Last session we did not go below $1,200. You are cutting these men down who deliver your mail in good weather and in bad weather, in snow and in rain, 5 per cent. It would be, I think, a good deal better to cut down the salaries of men who receive larger salaries and let these men have enough to live upon. Their salaries now are scarcely sufficient to sustain them. If we are to have them they should be decently paid. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will prevail.

I know my friend from Ohio, who says that we ought not to have these carriers in cities of less than 100,000, knows that their salaries are not too large now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a single word. I should be very glad to hear my friend from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] draw a comparison between the compensation paid to these letter-carriers, a very respectable body of men undoubtedly, and that paid to the skilled mechanics of his own city; the skilled mechanics, the men who are devoting a life-time to the attainment of the skill which is displayed in the various branches of mechanics in this country. Here are gentlemen who require respectable attainments in scholarship to read and write the inscriptions on letters and papers, but they receive at least twice the compensation that is paid to-day for the skilled labor in his own city. And I think my friend will make the fatal mistake of his public life if he enters on public life with the understanding as a maxim in politics that compensation in public employment should exceed the compensation paid in the private employments of life requiring similar skill, intelligence, and integrity. I predict that in the attempt at civil-service reform in this country, which must come if our republican institutions survive, the effort will be to strike down and remove this motive for struggling into public employment by assimilating the compensation to that which is paid in the private employments of life. If that rule is not adopted it is too manifest to talk about it that our republican institutions will not long survive. Yet here out of thirty millions of revenue you are proposing to appropriate two millions for this service, the recipients of which are paid two and three times as much as the skilled laborers of this country receive. I am surprised that a state of things like this should be allowed to exist in our Government.

Mr. COX. I desire to say just one word more. The gentleman from Indiana gives, I think, a wrong impression to the House. The retrenchment proposed last session was in regard to salaries above $1,200. It was not intended to strike down letter-carriers whose salaries are all fixed by law and are less than $1,200; and because simply of the deficiency in the appropriation the Postmaster-General was compelled to make the reduction.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

Mr. COX. Now, when my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] undertakes to make an ad hominem upon me because last session we fought for retrenchment, I beg to say we did not fight on that line of cutting down salaries below $1,200.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to a particular point: How about the clerks? Have you not just now favored a reduction of salaries of clerks? And they are under $1,200.

Mr. COX. I do not want to get into an irrelevant controversy with the gentleman about that; but he threw out a little playful remark that I was now working to get the aid of these letter-carriers in my district for some future occasion. I do not need their aid.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I said.

Mr. COX. I never did need their aid. I never was placed in quite so critical a position. All the people of my district wanted me for Congress, except only about twenty-eight dissentient republican gentlemen. Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio himself, [Mr. FOSTER,] had he been there, would have caught the general contagion. [Laughter.] There was no difficulty about my election. It was not brought about by intimidation or bull-dozing. It was a fair and square election, and leaves me in such an independent position as that I can speak for justice to these men, whose salaries ought to be placed where the Revised Statutes now place them.

Mr. HOLMAN. How does the statute place them?

Mr. COX. The Postmaster-General fixes them under the statute. We have already discussed that point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, allow me to ask in justice to these men, that the papers be read from the Postmaster-General and the postmaster at New York, and you will see that these men are scandalously and inadequately paid for their services.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask the gentleman from New York how many of the skilled mechanics in New York are receiving more than $900, which is the average pay of this class of employés?

Mr. COX. I am informed that the skilled mechanics of New York, who work a less number of hours nearly by one-half than these men are paid more than these men on an average.

Mr. BANNING. And they do not get what they ought to have.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say that mechanics on the average are paid less than the average pay of these men. My friend from Chicago [Mr. HARRISON] tells me that skilled mechanics are receiving $1.50 per day, and yet $900 is the average pay of these employés.

The question being taken on Mr. STONE's amendment as modified, there were—ayes 41, noes 81; no quorum voting.

The Chairman, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. COX and Mr. HOLMAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 93.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend the pending paragraph by inserting, after the clause relating to payment of letter-carriers, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the compensation of letter-carriers employed at post-offices in all cities having a population of 100,000 or over shall be as follows: For the first year's service, or for any portion thereof, at the rate of $800 per annum; for the second year's service, or for any portion thereof, at the rate of $900 per annum; and for the third year's service, or for any portion thereof, and thereafter, at the rate of $1,000 per annum: Provided, That no increase of annual compensation beyond $800 shall be allowed to any letter-carrier, except on the recommendation of the postmaster at the office at which such carrier may be employed: And provided further, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the compensation of letter-carriers employed at post-offices in cities having a population less than 100,000 shall be at the rate of not less than $600 nor more than $800 per annum, according to length of service; and that the rate to be paid to letter-carriers at each of said offices shall be fixed within the above-named limits by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on this amendment that it is independent legislation, and is not a measure of retrenchment; and I desire to have that point of order ruled upon.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. CLYMER.) The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Revised Statutes contain this provision:

Letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail-matter, as frequently as the public convenience may require, at every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of its post-office; and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than twenty thousand within the delivery of its post-office.

The word "may" is used in the one instance, and the word "shall" in the other. The next section of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General, and shall not exceed $800 per annum; but on satisfactory evidence of diligence, fidelity, and experience, he may increase their salary to any sum not exceeding $1,000 a year each.

My point of order is that the proposed amendment changes the existing law and does not reduce salaries; I do not say it increases them. It changes existing law and is not a measure of retrenchment; that is to say, it does not actually reduce the amount to be appropriated.

Mr. STONE. By section 3866 of the Revised Statutes the minimum amount to be paid to letter-carriers is fixed at $800 a year, and the maximum amount at $1,000. My proposed amendment does not change the salaries at all, but it defines what may be paid to carriers for the first, second, and third year of their services, in no case to exceed $1,000. I do not think, therefore, that the point of order is well taken, for my amendment does not increase or decrease salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it does not increase or reduce salaries, but it changes the law, and is not a measure of retrenchment; it is a change of law without increase or decrease of salary. The rule is peremptory that no change in existing law shall be made upon an appropriation bill except it be as a measure of retrenchment. This proposed amendment is simply a change of the law, without increase or decrease of expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. Rule 128 provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

The Chair has no doubt that the amendment is germane to the bill; but it does not show affirmatively that it will retrench expenditures. The Chair therefore rules that the point of order is well taken and that the proposed amendment is not in order.

Mr. STONE. I move to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph simply for the purpose of stating that it would appear to be the idea of some gentlemen that all intelligence in regard to this bill is centered in the Committee on Appropriations, and that no other gentleman upon this floor is to be regarded as having examined into it.

I will ask to have printed as a portion of my remarks, not to be read, some communications which I hold in my hand.

There was no objection.

The communications are as follows:

NEW YORK, August, 1, 1876.

To Hon. JAMES N. TYNER,
Postmaster-General:

The undersigned, letter-carriers employed at the post-office in the city of New York, respectfully ask that the orders issued by your immediate predecessor and by yourself, of dates September 22, 1874, and May 3 and July 17, 1876, by which the salaries of letter-carriers have been reduced from the amounts at which they were fixed prior to the first-named date be so modified that their provisions shall not apply to the salaries of letter-carriers employed at this office.

Your petitioners respectfully present the following statements in support of their request for such exceptional action:

First. That while it is a well-known fact that the market prices of provisions, fuel, and clothing in this city are not lower than those which rule in other cities at which the free-delivery system is established, the charges for house rent are much higher than elsewhere, so that amount which is in other cities sufficient to procure ample room and comfortable accommodations is here barely adequate to cover the rental of narrow and inconvenient premises in the most undesirable portions of the city; while the necessity for both early and late attendance at our posts of duty renders our residence in the suburbs impracticable. No apartments in which ourselves and families can reside without being subjected to discomfort and annoyance through offensive surroundings, and the lack of those conveniences necessary to constitute a decent home, can be obtained here for less than from three to four hundred dollars per year—an outlay which leaves but a small margin to cover the other expenditures necessary in the maintenance of a family.

Second. That the duty performed by letter-carriers in New York is far more severe and exhausting than that performed by the carriers in other cities. Seven and eight deliveries, and from twelve to fourteen collections daily, are certainly more than are required from carriers elsewhere, while the great number of crowded tenement houses and of large buildings occupied in some cases by hundreds of fea-ants engaged in commercial and professional business, and located from the basement to the fifth, sixth, and even eighth floor, renders the performance of the delivery duty here especially onerous and fatiguing. Our labors begin at a far earlier and terminate at a far later hour than those of either mechanics or clerks whose compensation exceeds that which we now receive. Before dawn and far into the night we are compelled to toil, in order to meet the demands of the public for prompt, frequent, and faithful deliveries and collections.

Third. That a conspicuous result of the exceptional amount of duty which New York letter carriers perform appears in the official records of the Department, which show that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the receipts from local postage at this office exceeded by nearly $750,000 those of the next largest office in the Union, while the cost of the service here was less than $140,000 more in this city than there. We can justly claim that this large contribution to the postal revenues has been the direct effect of the inducements which our frequent and prompt deliveries and collections have presented to the public to avail themselves of the post-office for transmission of their local correspondence, once intrusted to private messengers and expresses; and we venture respectfully to submit the question whether those who have proved themselves exceptionally profitable servants may not fairly receive exceptional consideration in the matter of compensation, without affording substantial ground for any charge of partiality to them or of injustice to others.

Fourth. That in this city, owing to the imperative necessity of meeting the postal requirements of our citizens, especially that large portion of them engaged in mercantile pursuits, and of fulfilling their expectations of a trustworthy local service, every temporary absence from duty—even though caused by illness contracted or accident occurring in the course of that duty—occasions us direct and often severe pecuniary loss. Substitutes are at once placed on the routes thus vacant, and for their services we must pay from our scanty earnings, though perhaps at the same time accumulating a burden of debt for medical attendance, of which months of an economy amounting to actual privation are required to relieve us. Your petitioners are aware that, theoretically, they form no exception to the carriers at other cities in this request; that the official regulation on this subject applies to all alike; but from the best information they can obtain they believe that in practice elsewhere the labor of carriers absent through illness is, as a rule, assumed by their comrades in addition to their own—an arrangement impracticable here, where each man's daily task embraces all the labor of which he is physically capable.

In conclusion, and without extending our arguments to tedious length, we respectfully and earnestly ask that you will give careful attention to the prayer of this petition and due consideration to the statements contained therein, and that you will restore to all carriers at this office above the grades of "substitutes" and "auxiliary" the compensation which they received previous to October, 1874, namely, $800, $900, and $1,000 per annum, according to length of faithful service.

With hopes of a favorable reply, and with the expression of our official and personal respect, we are, your obedient servants.

PAT'K H. GOODWIN,
MICHAEL J. SMITH,
JAMES H. HENNESSEY.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 18, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, through the hands of Mr. James, postmaster of the post-office at New York City, of your letter inclosing a petition of the letter-carriers at your office, asking for a revocation of the orders of the Postmaster-General, dated September 22, 1874, May 3, 1876, and July 17, 1876, by which the salaries of the carriers were reduced, and also for the restoration of the said salaries to their former standard.

Without replying in detail to the averments of the petition, I will simply say that the reduction in the salaries of this class of employés in the various free-delivery cities of the country was made necessary by the reduction in the appropriations for the current fiscal year. The estimate for the payment of letter-carriers for this year was $2,100,000. The appropriation provided by Congress was $1,900,000. The probable expenditures for this branch of the service during the present year will amount to $1,878,833, most of which is arrived at by a computation of the salaries already fixed and the remainder estimated from reliable data before the Department, which leaves a margin of the appropriation of only $21,167 to cover all the contingencies which may arise during the year. If the prayer of the petitioners for the revocation of the orders of May and July, 1876, were granted, the increased expenditure made necessary thereby would amount to over $56,000, thereby leaving a deficiency of over $35,000. And if the further prayer of the petitioners for the revocation of the Postmaster's order of September 22, 1874, were granted the expenditures of deficiencies would be largely increased over and above the sum just mentioned. In view of the fact that the letter and spirit of the law forbids the creation of deficiencies by the head of any Department, I need not add that I cannot grant the prayer of these petitioners without violating my obligation as a public officer. I am therefore compelled to decline it.

Before closing this reply I beg leave to say that the reduction in the appropriation which has made the decrease in the compensation of this class of faithful employés necessary was not made upon the advice of the Post-Office Department. No officer of this Department who is familiar with the arduous and difficult duties performed by the letter-carriers has ever believed that they were overpaid; and no request for the appropriation which required such a reduction has emanated from the Department. All the facts in connection with this branch of the service, and especially so many of them as related to the injustice that would probably be done to these poorly paid people, were fully laid before the proper committees of the two Houses of Congress at its recent session. If, therefore, hardships shall follow the necessary decrease of pay of the letter-carriers, the fault does not lie with this Department.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JAS. M. TYNER,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. T. L. JAMES,
Postmaster, New York.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, letter-carriers of the city of New York, have been appointed by their associates a committee to bring to your attention the inclosed bill for regulating the salaries of letter-carriers, and to ask that you will, at your earliest convenience, introduce the same and give it your earnest support. Its provisions, we believe, will commend themselves to your approval as simply intended to secure to the letter-carriers throughout the country a fair compensation for faithful service. The rates which they fix are certainly not extravagant, and are in fact identical with those which ruled up to the date of an order of Postmaster-General Jewell, issued under the authority conferred by existing statute. That order reduced the maximum pay of carriers from $1,000 to $900, leaving untouched, however, the pay of those carriers who were then receiving the former amount. A subsequent order from Mr. Jewell extended the reduction to the latter class, and by a still later order the present Postmaster-General again reduced our maximum pay to $875—a measure rendered necessary by lack of sufficient appropriation for free-delivery service.

It is hardly necessary, we believe, to present to you, who have for so many years been a resident here, any facts or arguments with a view to convince you that our present compensation ($675, $775, and $875, according to length of service) is neither a fair equivalent for our labors nor sufficient to enable us to maintain ourselves and families in tolerable comfort and respectability; but we nevertheless take the liberty of inclosing herewith a copy of a petition addressed to the Postmaster-General in August last, and presented to him by Postmaster James, in which the reasons for our request are fully set forth; and to this we respectfully ask your careful attention.

Postmaster-General Tyner, in his reply, a copy of which we also inclose, expressed himself as satisfied of the justice and fairness of the increase asked for, but was compelled, for the reason above named, to refuse the prayer of the petition. We venture to believe that the provisions of the inclosed bill would meet with his cordial approval; and we commit it to your hands, confident that you will do all in your power to secure its passage.

Very respectfully,

PAT'K H. GOODWIN,
MICHAEL J. SMITH,
JAMES H. HENNESSEY.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

For inland-mail transportation, namely: For transportation on star routes and by steamboats, and all other than railroad routes, $6,000,000; for transportation by railroad, $9,000,000.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move to amend that portion of the paragraph just read relating to transportation of star routes and by steamboats by making the amount appropriated $6,237,993. That will restore the amount to the sum estimated for by the Postmaster-General. I will state that the amount proposed by the Postmaster-General for what is called the star and steamboat service, which embraces the entire postal service in the Territories and in many of the Southern States, is $500,000 less than the appropriation for the present fiscal year. During the last session we had a discussion on this subject, and it was then stated that this service had been neglected. It was shown, not upon my statement merely, but upon the statement of gentlemen from various quarters interested, that the service as then carried on was not adequate to the demands of the people. Now I would like to read a few lines showing the basis of the present estimate of the Postmaster-General for this service. I read from his last report:

The cost of transportation on other than railroad routes for 1876 was $5,658,000. Estimating the cost for 1877 at an increase of 5 per cent., the amount would be $5,940,946. At the same rate of increase, the estimate for 1878 is set down at $6,237,993. This is deemed sufficient for the probable requirements of the service, though the sum is $499,858 less than the appropriation for the current year.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the basis upon which this calculation was made was the expenditure of $5,658,000 for the service of 1876. But as I said a while ago that service was deficient. The service had been reduced in many places and the money used for the increase of railroad service. Upon this expenditure, under which the service was deficient, it is proposed to make merely an increase of 5 per cent., which I submit is very small, by no means adequate to the increased necessities of the service in various quarters. What calculation has induced the Committee on Appropriations to reduce the amount $230,000 below this I cannot understand. In making up the amount which I ask to have appropriated every item is reduced to the lowest possible figure. The service for 1876 was inadequate; and the addition of 5 per cent. is inadequate; yet the committee propose a reduction of $230,000 upon a result arrived at in this way by the Postmaster-General.

Now, whatever may be said about the Postmaster-General, I will do him the justice to say that he is a gentleman who can calculate closely and who has not shown any particular partiality to this branch of the service. It seems to me, therefore, that we are perfectly safe in following his estimate in this respect. I cannot conceive any ground upon which the Committee on Appropriations reduced the amount except upon the mere consideration that $6,000,000 is less than $6,230,000. Of course, by making this reduced appropriation the expenditures of the Government may be diminished to that extent; but at what sacrifice to the interests of the people! For, as I have already stated, the service has heretofore been deficient. In this statement many gentlemen here will bear me out. Though the addition of 5 per cent. is inadequate, I am willing under the circumstances to take the figures as proposed by the Postmaster-General; but certainly not to go $230,000 below those figures, as the Committee on Appropriations propose.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] concludes his remarks by a statement that he cannot understand how the committee came to the conclusion to make this reduction. Sir, the committee have had this matter under consideration not only during this session but also during the last session. We then brought into this House a bill appropriating a sum which we regarded as entirely sufficient for the purpose. It was immediately given out—you could hear the intimation all through this Hall—that there were to be no more additions to the star-route service; and that intimation came from the Post-Office Department. When that was understood here, the committee was at once abandoned by this side of the House, and large additions were made to the amount which the committee after careful consideration had seen fit to report. The result was that the humiliating statement was made by the Postmaster-General to the committee of conference, that this House in its demoralization had given him for that service more than he desired. That, I say, was a humiliating statement; and I hope no such state of things will occur again.

So far as regards the increase in the service, the report of the Department itself shows an addition of several thousand miles, while there has been a reduction of $480,000 in the cost—a greater amount than the reduction which the committee deemed proper upon the former bill. I am satisfied that we have not erred in this particular. During the last session we had before us various officials connected with the service; we examined them; we have had the tables of expenditures for several years; we have had before us the various reports. With all this information before us, and conscious that this was a most sensitive service, we have proceeded in reference to it with a great deal of care. I assure gentlemen that there is no reason for alarm in respect to this service; and I do hope the House will see fit to stand by the report of the committee.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, he holds that because the Postmaster-General stated last year that we had given him more than he asked, therefore at this session we ought not to give him what he asks. I am not here to antagonize particularly the report or recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, but I am in favor of what is called the star service. Large towns and cities can of course be supplied with mail facilities at a less proportional cost than sparsely settled communities; but I understand the object of our mail service to be to furnish mail communication to every American citizen wherever he may reside; and for the purpose of extending such facilities to the frontier, for the purpose of inducing settlement and opening up our country, this star service should above all others receive the support of this House. In the statement of the Postmaster-General at the last session, with reference to the appropriation in behalf of some communities that were not properly supplied, I say that he certainly was mistaken. The trouble is that the appropriation for this service has not been properly distributed. I know that there are communities not properly supplied with mail service under this appropriation. I undertake to say that the deficiency of this service is an almost universal complaint in the Western and Southern States. I submit that we ought not to reduce the amount which the Postmaster-General has recommended for this service, though he may have said that we appropriated at the last session more than he needed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out pro forma the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious to have the attention of the gentleman from Texas, as well as the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, while I explain the basis upon which this appropriation is made. If those gentlemen will refer to the report of the Postmaster-General for the last fiscal year they will find that the expenditures for that year were $6,137,851, that is, for the year 1875, while for the last year, that is, for 1876, the expenditures were $5,658,000.06, being a decrease of $479,850.94. In the mean time there has been a large increase of star service, but a heavy decrease in the expenditure for carrying out new contracts for carrying mails in the steamboat and star service. We appropriate in this bill $479,850.94 more than the expenses for the last year, and I think the gentleman will say that is ample.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Permit me to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman asks me let me make a correction. The amount appropriated by this bill is $342,000 more than was expended last year.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Even if amended as I propose, is not the amount $500,000 less than the appropriation for the present year?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; but every person understands that. The additional $500,000 was made by this House on the impulse of the moment, and was entirely unwarranted. We frequently do things of that kind, and the very next day the House reverses its judgment. At that time the House did not have before it all the data. We made the appropriation last year $342,000 more than was required.

I wish my friend from Texas to be so satisfied with this that he will withdraw his amendment. I feel myself a special interest in these star lines which carry the mail service to the sparsely settled sections of the country. They are the lines which supply the mails to the pioneers, and it is, I believe, the duty of Congress to be liberal in reference to that service. I think that has been done. But gentlemen must recollect that in consequence of the favorable mail-lettings of the last two years the expenditures have been so reduced that to make an appropriation of $6,000,000 would be an increase of $342,000 over the expenditures of last year.

Mr. GAUSE. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana how many of the new routes have had star service put upon them by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. HOLMAN. The addition is about three hundred and fourteen thousand miles, not 314,000 miles in distance but 314,000 miles of travel.

Mr. GAUSE. But how much of new star service has been put upon these new post-routes?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is twenty-five hundred and sixty-five miles in aggregate length, a decrease, let me say, as the Postmaster-General says, of $342,000 in the aggregate cost. The contracts made for carrying these mails in the olden time, that is in 1873 and 1874, were at a much higher rate than they can be let for now. As these old contracts expire, from time to time, it is found the expense is much less.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I should like to state in connection with the question of the gentleman from Arkansas, that the greater portion of the new post-routes proposed at the last session of Congress were contained in the second bill, which was delayed in the Senate, and not reported to this House and acted on until this very day. Those routes are still in abeyance. They have never been acted on by the Postmaster-General at all.

I will further state that I myself, and I have no doubt such has been the experience of others, have repeatedly made application to the Postmaster-General for necessary mail service and that application has not been granted.

The gentleman argues that the Postmaster-General's decision is considered sufficient, but whether that be so or not, it is entirely true that the people consider the service to be insufficient and wish to have it increased to the extent they deem necessary.

The gentleman has left unanswered what I stated in making my remarks in the first instance: that while the Postmaster-General has not shown any great partiality to that kind of service and while we have not been favored to such an extent as our people require and were entitled to, yet in my amendment I go entirely upon his figures. I say that, even if the Postmaster-General has only allowed 5 per cent. additional to a deficient service, I am yet willing to take the amount of his estimate. But the committee has gone under that estimate, for no reason I can see, $237,000.

Another reason stated by the gentleman from Georgia was that, inasmuch as the last time the Postmaster-General received more for that service than he asked and more than he used, he ought to receive less at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the estimates for this year are simply a repetition of the estimates of last year, and nothing more—the same figures exactly. The committee are not justified of course in going upon that basis, and I think my friend will hardly say the star routes and steamboat service would increase more than $342,000 for the coming year.

And yet that is the excess we appropriate by this bill over and above the expenditures of last year.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do you not know that the Postmaster-General has refused to put on special service, or to put service on new routes established, for the reason that he had not the means to do so?

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend must see that this very present year he has the difference between the expenditures of last year, $5,658,000, and $6,732,000 for this present year. Congress, of course, cannot direct the Postmaster-General where that mail service shall be.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does not the law require that wherever a new route is established it is the duty of the Postmaster-General to place a new service?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no It never has been and never could be the law. It would be fatal to the Post-office Department. The Postmaster-General must be left to his own discretion.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does the gentleman not know that there is a bill now pending on the Speaker's table by which some hundreds of new routes will be established as soon as the committee of conference between this House and the Senate shall have acted upon it?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And how are you to provide for this unless by an appropriation?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Postmaster-General in his discretion puts the service on such routes as are established. If a citizen of my friend's district sends to him a memorandum asking for a new post-route he drops it into the box at the Clerk's desk and it goes into the post-route bill as a matter of form; but we must leave it discretionary with the Postmaster-General as to the routes on which he shall place service. And when we are proposing to appropriate $342,000 more than the expenditure of last year, and when contracts that are expiring are being renewed on a more favorable basis, and when, I may add, I believe there is a more honest administration in that Department, I feel confident that the $342,000 will greatly exceed the amount of increased service for the next fiscal year.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana if he will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I renew it. In reply to the gentleman's remarks I wish to say that in 1875 there was appropriated for the star service $6,136,851. That money was appropriated and was used. Last year there were nearly $6,000,000 used for the star service; and yet—I speak for my district alone—I know of numbers of places in my district where my people have to employ private individuals to travel ten, fifteen, and twenty miles for their mail matter, but I have been unable to obtain a service on those routes for want of means. And I know that that is the case also in the district represented by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.]

Now the Post-Office Committee this morning had a session, and by a unanimous vote have instructed our chairman to offer the same amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Texas. We have considered this question all the way through. We find that there will be new routes established at this session of Congress, numbering some hundreds, many thousands of miles in extent. But where are we to obtain the money to place service on those routes unless we shall vote the estimates required by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not the same number of routes been established every session of Congress for the last three years? Is not that the fact?

Mr. LUTTRELL. That may be true. At the same time, as the gentleman has remarked, we have succeeded in getting rid of these dishonest bidders, these straw bidders, and we are making contracts on terms much more favorable for the Government than in former years; and for that reason we have been able to extend the service. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has remarked that the Postmaster-General came before the committee of conference last year and stated that we have appropriated more than was actually necessary. Now, if the Postmaster-General's word is good in one case, is it not also good in another, when he makes an estimate and asks for the amount specified in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas? I hope the amendment will prevail. I have had occasion to confer with the Postmaster-General a number of times as a member of the Post-Office Committee, and I say now without fear of contradiction that I believe he is the best Postmaster-General we have had for many years. He thoroughly understands the service, and I believe every dollar he has recommended is required for the postal service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman from California takes his seat I wish to ask him this question: Does he believe, having examined this subject in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that a larger increase of expenditures over that of last year than $342,000 is actually required for next year?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I believe this, that if we obtain the service on the routes which we have established and will establish, it will require every dollar that is proposed by the amendment. I believe that, or I would not vote for the amendment. I know full well that in the far West, in many localities, we have no mail service, and we cannot have mail service unless we give the Postmaster-General money to defray the expenses. And if it is not required this year it will be turned over for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes! I am surprised at that remark coming from the gentleman from California. [Mr. LUTTRELL.] Why not turn over all the Treasury at once? If that argument is a good one at all it is a good one for unlimited appropriations.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman may not require much postal service in his district. But I want to tell him that my constituents are reading men and women and require this postal service. I am in favor of appropriating every dollar asked for by the Postmaster-General for this service.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] have seen fit, for the purpose of arguing in favor of this increased appropriation, to refer to a statement which I made. I will restate it in order that the House may understand it.

During the last session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations, among other things, had before them a table coming from the present Postmaster-General, then Assistant Postmaster-General, in which he showed that in 1874 the cost of inland transportation was $15,402,057; for the succeeding year, 1875, the cost of inland transportation was $15,315,369, a decrease of over $75,000 on the cost of inland-transportation service. When he came before the committee last year with his estimates he ran up the cost of that inland transportation to seventeen and a half millions of dollars. When questioned by the committee in connection with other statements he admitted that he was in error.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not now.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to correct the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do not interrupt me. The Assistant Postmaster-General then admitted that the increased cost for 1876 would not exceed $300,000. The truth about the matter is that there has been a large reduction of some $400,000 in the expenses of 1876, although there has been an increase of three thousand miles of service, showing how mistaken the Postmaster-General was in his statement to our committee.

I have heard enough about these estimates from the Departments. No matter what party is in power in this House, whether republican or democratic, these Departments seem to think that it is proper for them to resort to such statements in order to get whatever sums of money they may desire. I will say that there has at least been some very bad guessing by the gentlemen who make up these estimates.

Mr. LUTTRELL. One question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do not interrupt me.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Only a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I cannot consent to be interrupted; I have not time. In view of these facts, after careful consideration of this matter, the Postmaster-General, as I stated, did say that members of this side of the House had come to his Department and told him that they had voted all that he asked, and that he had more money than he actually wanted. I mentioned it, not that gentlemen should deduce the conclusion that too much had been voted before, but that the estimates of the Departments are no sure guide to us. The best guides this side of the House can have are the committees who have investigated the subject.

In 1875 there was an actual reduction on the cost of 1874; and in 1876 there was a decrease of several hundred thousand dollars. Yet gentleman are insisting, against the proof, that we shall take these estimates on the idea that there is an annual increase of 5 per cent. in the item of inland transportation.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I would like to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Then I will move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has made some very pointed remarks. I would like to go back to the point from which we started.

When I was at home, I found that every contract for carrying these mails in my district was down to its lowest figure, as low as people could be got to carry the mails. I found, moreover, that the postal service in my district was everywhere deficient. Before I left here last summer, I went to the Post-Office Department—I suppose I am one of those gentlemen to whom the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has referred—I went to the Post-Office Department and asked that we should be given the amount of service that the people needed. I asked that it should be given on the ground that the Postmaster-General had been given all the money and more than he had asked for this branch of the service. That was the argument I used with him.

I do not say that the amount of our postal service should depend on the amount of appropriations given to the Post-Office Department. You may give, as you did last year, a half a million more than the Department asks, and the Postmaster-General will not extend the service if he does not see proper to do so. He does not in my district—I do not speak of other districts—give us the amount of mail service which we need. Our service is not such as the people have the right to demand of the Department.

When the Postmaster-General gave as a reason for not granting the service I asked that he had not sufficient money, I told him that sufficient appropriations of money had been given him by Congress. But although the money had been given to him he did not use it and still persists in refusing the necessary service. Gentlemen may draw what conclusions they please, but such is the fact.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and his associates on the committee, in a burst of generosity—or perhaps it was a mistake which they would have corrected the next day if they had the opportunity—gave more money to the Department than was necessary, and he now quotes the Postmaster-General as authority for that action. It was stated also in the last House that the service was not sufficient; and the House, not in a burst of unthinking generosity, but with a generous and far-seeing recognition of the necessities of the frontier and the more sparsely settled portions of the country, provided the means for rendering this service more nearly adequate to the public demands. The Postmaster-General has not expended the whole appropriation for the purpose intended; but that does not prove to my mind that the appropriation was not necessary. Still in my present amendment I have gone back to the Postmaster-General's ideas, inadequate as they are to the occasion. We shall be satisfied if the House will give us only what he says is necessary, and not appropriate $240,000 less than his inadequate estimate.

[The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCHLEICHER, to insert "$6,237,993" instead of "$6,000,000" as the appropriation for transportation on star routes and by steamboats and all other than railroad routes, there were—ayes 73, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHLEICHER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 57.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will not rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 111, noes 46.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the post-office appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

REMOVAL OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the 7th instant of the House of Representatives asking to be informed whether any, and what, negotiations have been or are being made with the Sioux Indians for their removal to the Indian Territory, and under what authority the same has been and is being done, I submit herewith a report received from the Secretary of the Interior which contains, it is believed, all the information in possession of his Department touching the matter of the resolution.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 14, 1876.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the message and accompanying report be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CHITTENDEN: The petition of the New York Temperance Society, J. N. Stearns, president, that the House of Representatives concur in the passage of the Senate bill to provide for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. GIBSON: The petition of Mrs. Emily B. Amory, wife of Charles B. Amory, late captain in the United States Army, for property taken and supplies furnished the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KIDDER: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Glenwood, via Kidder and Brooklyn, to Tunerall, Dakota Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. McFARLAND: The petition of Joseph W. White, late a private in Company G, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of William Bowen, that the commissioners for the District of Columbia be directed to reconsider his claim for work and labor done under contract with said commissioners, and allow him an additional sum claimed to be due him, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petition of James M. Jones, Edward H. Walton, and other citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, for the appointment of a commission to inquire concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of William H. Bradford, William T. Davis, and other citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of Thomas M. Corkle, jr., Julius Dodd, and other citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, of similar import, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 15, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHAFFEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1078) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1079) for the extension of the patent known as Reynold's patented brake for power-looms; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1081) for the relief of John Jackson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1080) for the relief of James Millenger; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the additional papers that I now present and those already on file in this case be referred with the bill to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. THURMAN. If in order to make the motion now I move that the bill (S. No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session, be made the special order for the second Tuesday in January.

Mr. WEST. Would it not suit the convenience of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the order for a week further? I shall be compelled to be absent from the Senate at that time, if it is in session, and I believe some other Senators also will be away. If he will be kind enough to name the third Tuesday of January, I think it will answer the purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly have every disposition to accommodate, and it is my duty to accommodate the Senator from Louisiana, who is the chairman of the Committee on Railroads, and who has a bill to which this bill may be said to be in antagonism; but this being a short session the bill might fail for want of time to consider it, especially as political matters may take up so much of our time. If the Senator would prefer to have it taken up before the holidays I would have no objection to doing that. [A pause.] The Senator from Louisiana suggests to me reasons why, I suppose, I ought to yield to his proposition, unless Senators will agree to take it up before the holidays, and perhaps there is no chance to do that. I will therefore say the third Tuesday in January.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the bill which he has named be made the special order for the third Tuesday in January, which motion requires a two-thirds vote. [Putting the question.] Two-thirds having voted for the motion, the bill is made the special order for that day.

PAYMENT OF ELECTORAL MESSENGERS.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of the electoral messengers, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $20,000 for payment of the messengers of the respective States for conveying to the seat of Government the votes of the electors of said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, at the rate of twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance, by the most usual road traveled, from the place of meeting of the electors to the seat of Government of the United States, computed for the one distance only.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask if this legislation is to provide for the payment of these persons going and returning?

Mr. WINDOM. But one way.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that the usual provision?

Mr. WINDOM. I was going to make a brief statement as to the law on the subject, as we understand it. By the act of March 1, 1792, section 7, it was provided that they should be paid one way twenty-five cents per mile. By the act of February 11, 1825, it was provided that they should be paid twenty-five cents a mile for both ways, going and returning. The Revised Statutes provide for paying only one way, and the Committee on Appropriations have recommended the appropriation upon the law as it now stands. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has some suggestions to make upon the subject. The committee did not feel at liberty to make the appropriation upon any other basis than what they supposed to be the existing law, and we have had information from the Treasury Department that under the Revised Statutes they would pay but one way twenty-five cents.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My attention was called to this subject by the Secretary of the Treasury and I have examined the statutes. I have also a report here from the First Comptroller, from which perhaps the Senate will better understand the state of the law and the change that was made, as I think, by the commissioners in the revision. I have no doubt they altered the statute from what it was before. At any rate they changed the statute as far as the construction of it is concerned at the Treasury. I ask that the copy of the letter of the Comptroller to the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1876.

SIR: On examination I find there is no appropriation for paying the mileage of messengers bringing the electoral votes of the several States to Washington, and mileage cannot be paid until an appropriation for that purpose shall have been made.

By act of June 10, 1872, an appropriation of $25,000 was made for pay of messengers of that year. The amount paid messengers four years ago was $17,465.25; add for Colorado $914.50; actually required, $18,379.75, if the mileage is not varied from twenty-five cents per mile "going and returning."

In addition there was paid, under deficiency act of March 3, 1873, $638 to a second messenger from Louisiana, who brought another certificate of votes, making the actual payments $18,103.25. By act of March 1, 1792, messengers were allowed twenty-five cents per mile "from the place of meeting of the electors to the seat of Government of the United States."—Statute, volume 1, page 240, section 7.

By act of February 11, 1825, (4 Statutes, page 81,) the allowance was the same per mile as in the act of 1792, with the words "going and returning" added, in effect paying both ways.

By act of August 12, 1848, (9 Statutes, 295,) the allowance was fixed at twelve and a half cents per mile, "going and returning," and laws and parts of laws inconsistent were repealed.

By joint resolution of January 6, 1849, (9 Statutes, 417,) the last-mentioned provision was repealed, and another adopted that the messengers for 1848 should be paid as if it had not been passed. This has been construed as reviving the act of 1825, not only for the election of 1848, but for subsequent elections, and messengers have been paid on this construction both ways.

But by section 144 of the Revised Statutes, the law of 1792 is re-enacted, although it had been superseded by the act of 1825, and had had no force for that time, so that now, by virtue of this section 144, the compensation is twenty-five cents per mile one way only, and not "going and returning."

In calling your attention to the needed appropriation for the occasion, I beg also to make this statement concerning the law relating to the rate of compensation.

It is proper also to state that, from public information, it is probable that from each of four of the States two persons will present themselves as messengers bearing the votes of electors, and to say that under existing law one only from each State can be paid. I suggest that, if mileage both ways be authorized, an appropriation of $25,000 be made, and that, if Congress deem it proper to pay two messengers from a State, they so declare.

I am, very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER, Comptroller.

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not having for myself any doubt that the law was unintentionally changed by the commissioners in the revision, I will move to amend the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations so that it shall read twenty-five cents each way, following the old statute, and that the appropriation be increased to $25,000, although I am inclined to think, perhaps, that $20,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee left it at $20,000 because, after considering the suggestion of the Senator, they thought that would be enough.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose $20,000 will be enough.

Mr. WINDOM. Probably $20,000 will be enough, or $22,000 at the highest, on the basis the Senator suggested.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator propose to pay twenty-five cents mileage each way?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. In addition to per diem compensation?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is no per diem compensation.

Mr. THURMAN. Twenty-five cents a mile then includes all that they are to receive?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir. There is no per diem.

Mr. DAVIS. Has there been an amendment offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 9 and 10 it is proposed to strike out the words "computed for the one distance only."

Mr. BOUTWELL. That would not be definite enough. I am looking for the old statute. If the Clerk will read the bill I will indicate the words to be inserted.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In lines 9 and 10 I move to strike out the words "computed for the one distance only," and insert "going and returning."

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the language of the old statute?

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is what it was.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the question will be taken on the amendment.

Mr. ALCORN and Mr. WINDOM addressed the Chair.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not desire to take the floor from my friend from Minnesota, and what I was about to say is not of very much importance, but nevertheless I deem it proper to say it.

In the first place, I regard the custom of paying by mileage, since the invention of railroads and the cheapness of travel, as a very unequal way of compensating either members of Congress or other officials coming to the capital upon official business. That is not the proper mode of meting out and awarding just payment, even to old and discharged servants. Members of Congress now, under the operation of the law, are paid, I believe, twenty cents a mile each way for travel. It is a fact known to the country that many members of Congress have railroad passes awarded to them as compliments from railroad presidents, so that it does not cost them a dollar, aside from their sleeping-car berths perhaps and their rations from their homes to this capital, and yet they derive, some of them, as much as $2,500 in the way of mileage. Now, you propose that these messengers shall be paid by the mile, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes that it shall be both ways. The messenger from California, that comes here at an outlay, if he pays for his ticket each way, of not exceeding $250——

Mr. DAVIS. O, no; $500 probably.

Mr. ALCORN. Well, put it at $500. That is the maximum of his outlay. He is authorized, for about ten days' or two weeks' service at the outside, to draw from the Treasury a sum equal to $2,000 in money. That is a pretty good business, I should say. He makes by the operation at least $1,000 or $1,200 clear cash. The man who comes from Virginia or from Maryland gets not enough to pay his hotel bill during the time he is here presenting his return.

I submit, Mr. President, whether this is an equal and just way to compensate those who perform service for the Government. I say it is unequal, but if that inequality shall continue to exist and if the principle of mileage shall be continued upon the statute-book, in Heaven's name I say that twenty-five cents a mile one way is amply sufficient. It will cover all the expenses of those who live remote from the capital at least, and it will put a very considerable sum of money into the pockets of all those messengers who live at the remote border of the nation.

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I shall if I have the opportunity vote against the principle of mileage altogether. I would give these officials such pay as should be estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury as sufficient to cover railroad rates. I would allow them compensation for the amount of their traveling expenses and a certain per diem for their pay. An officer performing duty for the Government of this nature should not look to it as a means of making money. A compensation sufficient to re-imburse the citizen who discharges this duty is amply sufficient. I should be willing to go even further than that, and make contribution in a just manner for his time; but I would not be willing to make compensation here at the rate of $300 a day for the time of some messengers who come from the eastern seaboard to the capital.

Mr. WINDOM. I only wish to say that the Committee on Appropriations endeavored to conform to the existing law on the subject. They were aware of the fact that for several elections past the compensation has been twenty-five cents a mile each way, and it was the impression generally I think that that would be the compensation. It is probably the impression that many of these messengers have. The Revised Statutes, however, which the Senator from Massachusetts thinks have made the change unintentionally, make it but twenty-five cents covering both ways. The committee, therefore, conforming to the statute, have reported the bill, and I submit the question to the Senate whether the amendment should prevail or not. My own judgment is that twenty-five cents per mile one way is pretty fair compensation, and that is what we report. I think it will pay the traveling expenses and allow a fair compensation for the time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I introduced this amendment chiefly because it conforms to what has been the law and the practice from 1825 without any interruption. In 1847 Congress did pass a resolution reducing the pay of these messengers to twenty-five cents a mile reckoning one way, but in 1848 that resolution was rescinded by Congress and the old rate of twenty-five cents each way re-established. That has continued until the commissioners for revising the statutes incorporated the old act of 1792, paying no regard to that of 1825 or the subsequent legislation. Therefore, acting for the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I thought it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to this error. But I am also of opinion that the compensation was not disproportionate to the service when you consider the character of the service and the character of the gentlemen who are likely to be intrusted with its performance. It is upon the whole not a large matter for the country that we pay $20,000 once in four years for this service. I suppose twenty-five cents a mile one way will just about pay the expenses of a person traveling over the country and leave him little in compensation for his time. I am of opinion that we ought to re-establish the law, because it is the law, and these places have been taken under the expectation that the old provisions would be observed in the payment. I think also it is only a proper thing for the country to pay compensation as liberal as this will be at twenty-five cents a mile; and if our predecessors twenty years ago could pay it, I think it can be paid now.

Mr. ALCORN. A word, sir, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think that he is warranted in saying that this law, which now rests on the statute-book of the country, was an omission on the part of Congress. I do not think the facts will warrant him in making that assertion. It may be that in this respect it was an omission; but I had the honor to be upon the committee for the revision of the laws and the committee that passed upon this statute, and I am very sure that so far as I am concerned there was no omission in that respect. I remember to have looked at it, and I thought the reason very sufficient for having conformed to the principle that was enacted in 1847 of paying but one way. When, however, in 1875, as the Senator says, Congress passed the law he refers to, we had none other than the dirt-road system in this country. The mode of cheap travel that is now in operation did not then exist. There was another and more expensive and more tedious mode of traveling, and the compensation system by mileage at that time was a proper system; but now the whole thing is changed. Now we have cheap travel, rapid transit, and I insist that the principle of compensation should be different.

If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to change the mode of payment, he should propose to do it by an amendment of the law; it should not go in the form of an amendment upon this appropriation bill. It should be fixed upon the statute-book, that we may know from this time henceforward what the law of the case is. He, however, proposes to go forward here and put this amendment on the appropriation bill of to-day, and he proposes at the same time to leave on the statute-book the law as it has been enacted by the Congress of the United States. Upon what principle does he defend his position? If it is right and proper that this mode of compensation should be changed, and that the compensation should be increased, it is right and proper at the same time that it should be changed by a law placed upon the statutes of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, we are about to signalize the fidelity that we professed so strongly at the last session to the immaculate purity of the appropriation bills, by making a dig at these gentlemen, half of whom have already performed the service and are entitled to their money, in order at the next presidential election, which some people think will come on immediately after the 4th of March or the second Wednesday of February or some time, to have another cry about reform and economy. Now I for one am going to stick to the principle that I avowed at the last session and at previous sessions, that it is not right, when a sum of money is to be appropriated to carry out existing law, to feel it to be our duty every time or any time, except in some extreme emergency, to go to tinkering the law itself. Here the statute has fixed the compensation of these gentlemen, and there is plainly no politics in it, for about as nearly even as you can divide there will be an equal number of both parties coming on, and sometimes from the same State.

Now, then, if I can get a chance, I am going to move to strike out all that part of the bill which changes the law, and leave it a simple appropriation, which is consistent with what I, and, I believe, most of us, preached at the last session, that if we want to change the laws we should do it upon considerations, but as long as we have them we will carry them out. Is it in order now to move to strike out?

Mr. WINDOM. The bill does not change the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood it changed the law.

Mr. WINDOM. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is not the case, I oppose all amendments.

Mr. KERNAN. I am opposed to the amendment on account of the principle alluded to by the Senator from Vermont and also because I believe twenty-five cents a mile one way is quite enough. I do not think in an appropriation bill or in any other way it should be increased. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I should like to hear the bill read and then the amendment proposed, so that we may know exactly what we are to vote upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill and the amendment proposed by Mr. BOUTWELL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I am going to vote against the amendment; and, if that is defeated, I shall move to strike out all the law-making there is in the bill, so as to leave it on the existing law just as it is and make it a simple appropriation of that sum of money to pay those messengers.

Mr. CONKLING. How much will that give them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same sum that the bill does, it is said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to state in one word the reason which will induce me to vote for the amendment. The commission to revise the statutes, if I am right in my recollection, had no earthly power to change a statute. We do know that a great many changes were made, some perhaps advisedly; some, it is believed, were made without the knowledge of anybody except the particular individual interested in making the particular change. The statute in this case was twenty-five cents a mile for travel each way. Now, I hold that the change has been made without the knowledge of Congress, and that this amendment is simply to make the law what it would have been if a change had not been made surreptitiously, carelessly, or in some way nobody can tell how. We know how the Revised Statutes were passed. They were passed in a lump, and I am quite sure there are no Senators in this body or probably none outside of the members of the committee who will tell us that they had any earthly knowledge of this change in the law. The amendment proposed puts the law precisely where it was, puts the compensation at precisely what it was; it puts it at what it should be if the statutes had been revised as they ought to have been without a change.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, my first impression was to vote for the amendment, but after hearing the state of the question and the suggestions that have been made, I feel constrained to vote against it, and I wish to say in reply to what has just fallen from my friend, the Senator from Maine, that if we undertake to correct on the appropriation bills all the errors of the Revised Statutes, we shall have our hands full, and our appropriation bills will be a very curious set of documents. I do not know how many errors have already been corrected or been professed to be corrected by act of Congress, but my impression is more than two hundred; and I think the Senator from Massachusetts had a bill at the last session—I do not know whether it passed or not; I do not think it did—that proposed to correct as many more.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We have a long bill now that we shall bring up at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. THURMAN. That is a bill to correct a couple of hundred more. I do not know whether his bill corrects them or changes the law; but it professes to make corrections. I do not think, to use a very familiar, but not elegant, expression, that you can lick the Revised Statutes into shape by amendments to appropriation bills.

Mr. CONKLING. Listening to the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Ohio, I feel moved to say that I think together they do the commissioners dishonor overmuch. It is true, no doubt, that a good many, in number, most of them very trivial, errors, were found, despite all the winnowing process to which the consolidated statutes were subjected, still there. It is not true, however, that either surreptitiously or carelessly, borrowing a phrase from my honorable friend from Maine, the commissioners or anybody else, interpolated into the statutes that kind of error, that kind of change which would naturally be inferred from the tone in which these Senators speak. It is not the duty, it is not the personal interest of the present Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or of any Senator who served on that committee heretofore, to defend as if against some personal reflection the work done upon these statutes. The two Houses of Congress directed not the committee of either or both Houses, but that a commission of external persons, appointed by the proper authorities, changed several times, sitting for years, should go on under the directions given to them and consolidate the statutes. The function of the Committee on the Revision of Laws was not only supervisory merely, but, as every Senator who reflects one moment will see, it must necessarily have stopped with a very superficial supervision. Here were the statutes which had been amassed for eighty-seven years; they were very voluminous; and, if I might make a remark without subjecting myself to the suspicion of being disrespectful to the legislative literature of the country, I should say that they were not all of them so artificially and perspicuously drawn as to make it a very easy task for any commission to deduce a clear and harmonious result. However, the commission for years worked upon these statutes; one commissioner after another tiring of his work, virtually fainting before his task and giving way, resigned and another was appointed; and in the end, in comparatively a brief period, the committees of the two Houses were called upon to act on all this work. The Senator from Ohio—and no Senator had he been on the committee would have been able to do better than he—would have smiled at the idea that he was to take sixteen or eighteen volumes of statutes, and two or three ponderous volumes coming as the result from those, and by comparison, letter by letter and word by word, ascertain the fidelity of the work. But even had all that been done, it would have furnished no security. Why? Because the purpose was not to treasure up these statutes with verbal exactness, but to deduce with exactness from them, in brief phrase, the essence of them all; and therefore, had the committee been able to gather and make a comparison in extenso, it would have amounted to nothing.

Then, Mr. President, not to multiply words, the committee in both Houses I believe, as I feel very sure I may say the committee in this House, devoted a great deal of time in subjecting these statutes to all the criticism of which they were susceptible; and then, as the Senator from Maine says, they were reported in block; they were never even engrossed; they were sent to the Printing Office and in an incredibly short time, considering the volume of the work, they were produced in print, the print being treated as the engrossed bill. Now, that typographical errors, that verbal errors and omissions such as this dropping the return phrase so that the twenty-five cents per mile turns out to be applicable to only one way—that such things occured is true, and I submit that they were unavoidable. And I hope I shall be pardoned by the Senate, having been myself at that time a member of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, if I listen sometimes with a little disquiet to some general observations as if somebody and everybody had been exceedingly heedless and miscellaneous, if I may so say, in the way in which he devoted himself to this work. It is not true. It is not true of the commission; it is not true of the committee. If the whole thing had to be done again, my impression is that it could not be improved on. The committee were very careful, when these statutes were submitted, to remind every Senator cogently that errors of this sort would be found; although they could not particularize them, the nature of the case was such that they could not but foresee them.

But enough on this subject; I want now to say one word about the amendment. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts said that the change made by the Revised Statutes in this instance was an unauthorized change. I think he must be quite right in that, because the law directed the commission to make these statutes in brevity as they were at large. Certainly it did not authorize any change. Making due allowance for that, it nevertheless turns out that a change has been made. The law, for every purpose, in every sense, is now as it reads and as it would be had it been the purpose of every member of the two Houses to make that change. That being so, it cannot be averred that on this appropriation bill we are going to change the law if we follow the law as it is.

I shall vote against this amendment for this simple reason: Assuming that the original tariff of compensation was right in the days of stage-coaches and saddle-horses, I feel able myself to determine upon my own knowledge that twenty-five cents a mile for travel by the present conveyances is very sufficient not only to defray expenses but to leave a considerable surplus. I venture to say that any Senator, speaking now without reference to existing law, would affirm it to be sufficient to be paid at large, to these messengers traveling very long distances and receiving very much mileage, as some of them do; and others, performing more trifling service, by journeying a less distance. If it be true then that as a fact now the compensation is sufficient, finding as we do, although by mistake, the law has been changed from what it used to be to make it so, I can hardly conceive that it is my duty to go back and vote for a compensation which I believe to be excessive because some law which once did, but does not now exist, fixed it, and fixed it upon conditions and for reasons which have passed away.

Mr. THURMAN. I should not say another word, but what has fallen from the Senator from New York makes it proper that I should say that the farthest thing in the world from my intention was to cast any reflection upon either the commission which made the compilation or on the two committees on the Revision of the Laws. I know very well the difficulty of performing such a duty as they attempted to perform. Possibly there is not a Senator who was on the floor then who has not a certain share of the responsibility, because I think the revisers were accustomed to send advance sheets of their work before they made their final report, and perhaps if all the Senators had gone to work and performed the duty they were called upon to perform, and pointed out any errors or omissions, there would have been fewer errors in the revision. But that was not to be expected of Senators in the vacation or in the time they had to spare here. They appointed a commission for that purpose. But, certainly, it is a very lamentable state of affairs that this book, which is all over the whole country in the hands of every judge of a court and in the hands of all the lawyers of the courts, has been changed in between two and three hundred particulars since its enactment in June, 1874.

But little over two years have gone by and more than two hundred changes in the text of these Revised Statutes have been made—I do not know but nearly or quite three hundred—and yet people are acting every day on the law which they find in this book, although it has been changed, and nobody can tell what the law is unless he takes the session laws and takes this book and makes with pen or pencil or in some other way marginal corrections or references to show him what the law is. This is so bad a state of affairs that it seems to me it will not be tolerable, especially if the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts shall pass which will add a couple of hundred more alterations in it; it will not be possible to get along without reprinting this book with the amendments that have been made.

In respect, however, to the accuracy of such things, there is a bit of history in my own State which is worth relating. When a very young man, Salmon P. Chase undertook to publish an edition of all the statute laws that had ever been enacted by Ohio, both in its territorial condition and as a State from 1789 up to 1831. He accomplished that work in three large volumes. He was then a young man unknown to fame. Some of us who were also young men, looking at it and believing it to be a very valuable contribution, petitioned the Legislature to have it printed at the public expense, and it was done; and now, after forty-five years have passed since the publication of that work, I believe I can safely affirm that not one single error has ever been discovered in it.

That is not all. Some years afterward Judge Swan, of Ohio, a single individual, undertook to publish the laws of Ohio as they then existed, which, of course, devolved upon him a similar duty to that performed by these commissioners, because he had to decide what laws had been repealed by implication or how they had been changed by conflict with other statutes. He published what was called "Swan's Statutes," and now I can say here that after thirty years have passed since that compilation was published I do not believe that one single error has been discovered in it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether the work of which he speaks in Ohio prepared by Governor Chase was a compilation of existing statutes, or whether it was an abbreviation and reproduction? Was it a revision of the laws or merely an aggregation of statutes?

Mr. THURMAN. I have already stated, if the Senator understood me——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not.

Mr. THURMAN. That it was simply a reprint of the laws.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That, I think, is a different work.

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly it is very different indeed, because he had nothing there to decide, but it was not so in the case of Swan's Statutes, for Swan had to decide what laws were in force, what laws had been repealed by implication or modified in any way; and yet in that revision, which was published in 1840 and which contained laws that had been enacted as early as 1802 and from that time down to 1840, I think not one error has ever been detected. I mention this to show that when a very able man with peculiar talents for such work goes to work upon the task of reviewing statutes and takes sufficient time he can make pretty good work.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I never understood before why it was that Ohio was the favorite State to which at least two Presidents resorted for members of this commission. It was the favorite State; commissioners were appointed from there, and when a vacancy occurred again appointments were made from Ohio once or twice. Now that I have heard from the Senator the peculiar and somewhat endemic facility which prevails in Ohio for doing such work, I understand why it was that the rest of the States were not permitted more largely to participate in doing the work. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. The only trouble is that the President in appointing commissioners did not take men who had proved themselves to be best qualified for this kind of work.

Mr. CONKLING. They were either not living or otherwise engaged. He could not take Chief-Justice Chase.

Mr. THURMAN. No; but Judge Swan is living to-day and Mr. Corwine has also published a revision of the laws and was also living; and Mr. Sayler was then living; but I do not want to go into this. I quite agree with the Senator from New York that almost any man in Ohio in the republican party is qualified for any office within the gift of the people of the country. [Laughter.] That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Burnside, Chaffee, Dawes, Ferry, Hamlin, McCreery, Maxey, Mitchell, and Ransom—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Blaine, Bogy, Booth, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, Morrill, Paddock, Price, Sherman, Thurman, Wallace, Windom, Withers, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Teller, Wadleigh, West, and Whyte—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out all the bill except the simple appropriation of money to pay the messengers, so that it shall stand as a mere appropriation bill under existing laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "United States," in line 6, as follows:

At the rate of twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance by the most usual road traveled, from the place of meeting of the electors to the seat of Government of the United States, computed for the one distance only.

So as to make the bill read:

That for payment of the messengers of the respective States for conveying to the seat of Government the votes of the electors of said State for President and Vice-President of the United States, the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that there is any objection to the amendment, though I think the bill as reported does not change the existing law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know; but it proposes to re-enact it.

Mr. WINDOM. I want simply to explain that the opinion of the committee was that it did not change the existing law, but was in strict conformity to it, and they did not think it necessary to send the bill back to the House on this, to some extent, technical objection. The language used is that by which the Department has construed the existing law, twenty-five cents one way, and we simply put in words that construction, which I think does not change the law substantially. If it did, the committee would not have agreed to it.

Mr. DAVIS rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope we may complete this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the consideration of the bill will be continued as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will not displace the regular order, I hope.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be subject to call.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood, though not officially, that there was some doubt at the Treasury Department whether it was for travel one or both ways that mileage should be paid. I understood that from a messenger who brought returns here. When I saw the bill, the fact appeared that it was to be but one way; and then hearing the Senator from Massachusetts this morning saying that the Treasury Department construed the law as authorizing the payment of mileage but one way, I supposed it would do no harm to leave the bill as it now stands as there had been some doubt at the Department.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I will read a short telegram from the Treasury Department, dated December 12:

It is understood in the Department that mileage is payable only one way and at twenty-five cents per mile.

L. M. MORRILL, Secretary.

Upon the construction thus given, the committee did not think it necessary to recommend any change in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend from Vermont that the bill as it stands now is a mere recitation of the existing statutes; that it is not in terms, nor can it be justly claimed, that it re-enacts the law. It recites the existing statute and says that compensation shall be paid upon the basis of the law as it now stands. I think the bill is not subject to the objection that has been so often urged here and in which I have uniformly concurred. I suggest, therefore, that the better course is to allow the bill to remain as it is. If I thought that by possibility it was subject to such objection or that it could be claimed by possibility that it was a change of existing statutes, I should favor the amendment. I have always favored amendments to appropriation bills that looked to excluding from them anything like legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that the bill does change the existing law in the sense of making a new law different from what the present law is, but nevertheless it will be the last statute upon the subject, and it certainly undertakes, as we all agree, to put a construction upon the preceding statute. We happen to be apparently unanimously of opinion here that that construction is the correct one. But suppose somebody in the House of Representatives or here next year says, "Here is a precedent for construing a statute;" it is true we all think we construe it right, but some of your people in the next case when you think they are not construing it aright will still have a precedent. The objection is exactly the same. You are undertaking to construe a preceding statute in an important particular by this present law in appropriating money; and that is just as much further legislating as anything could be. It may not be so important particularly where the construction is clear; but it would be just as much legislating in an appropriation bill if this bill had said "pay both ways." You are thus putting a construction on the former law, a construction which I agree with my friend from Iowa it will not bear, and yet at the same time you would be doing precisely the thing you are doing now. You are putting now what we all agree is a right construction on an old law. The next bill will be putting a construction which some will say is right and some will say is wrong. But I do not want to take time about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3057) establishing post-roads.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1874) granting a new register to the schooner Carteret; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3256) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Parke County, Indiana.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate to prepare and report, without delay, such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to insure a count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and a declaration of the result by a tribunal whose authority can determine the question and whose decision all will accept as final.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to give notice that I shall on Monday immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, if I can get the attention of the Senate, call up the bill reported from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment touching the salary of the President of the United States. It will be remembered that that bill was vetoed by a message of the President and was reported by the committee again recommending its passage. I do not propose at that time to take up the time of the Senate in its discussion, but shall ask a vote of the Senate, as I believe to be my duty.

While I am on the floor, I wish to say that to-morrow, or at some time thereafter, I shall ask leave to bring in a bill to provide a method for contests of the office of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to call up the resolution I reported yesterday in regard to the compensation of witnesses in attendance before committees, to be acted on.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection, with the understanding that it is subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside temporarily the regular order for the purpose of considering the matter suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to object, but to say that two or three days ago I gave notice that I should on the next day move to take up Senate bill No. 1, my purpose having been not for passage or discussion, but to move its reference to a committee. One of my senatorial brethren, for whose wishes I always entertain the highest respect, wished to make some observations upon that bill when it should be taken up, and through indisposition he is unable to go on to-day, when I had intended to move to take it up, as the matter under consideration yesterday occupied the whole day. This leads me to say that I shall not move to take it up to-day; but I had intended, unless something else were done on Monday, to call it up then. Now, however, a resolution from the House of Representatives upon that subject having come over, it is possible that the necessity for a reference of that particular bill, or for action upon that particular bill, may be superseded, as of course the respect that we owe to the House of Representatives, as well as the high importance of the subject to which the resolution they have sent us refers, necessarily lead us to appoint a committee similar to that which the House of Representatives have appointed, and to which, in effect, they invite our attention; so that, when the question comes up, we can deal with it in the one way or the other, as may seem proper. I only say this now, in order to explain my not having moved this morning and not having moved yesterday to take up the bill pursuant to the notice that I had given.

Mr. THURMAN. Is the regular order up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has suggested that it be laid aside temporarily, and it has been done with the concurrence of the Senator from Oregon for the purpose of taking up a resolution which the Senator from Massachusetts will state.

Mr. DAWES. For the purpose of considering a resolution reported by the Committee on Contingent Expenses fixing the compensation for witnesses before Senate committees. Senators are aware that there are several committees or subcommittees now in various States examining witnesses. There is no fixed rule about their compensation except so far as the statute is concerned, which fixes the compensation of witnesses under certain circumstances. The House of Representatives has adopted a rule, and the committee reported a rule here following the House rule, and that was reported yesterday and lies over. Senators will see the necessity of action on it. The committees now have no fixed rule by which they pay their witnesses.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to submit some observations on the resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon, and if this matter can be disposed of without debate I shall not object.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it will lead to debate.

FEES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only consent that it be taken up subject to the call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, as amended by the committee, will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate, or any of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of examination.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to insert after the word "way:"

Provided, That witnesses residing west of the one hundred and tenth meridian shall be paid the sum of seven cents each way for each mile they shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination when the place of examination shall be east of the Mississippi River.

So that if amended the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate, or any of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way: Provided, That witnesses residing west of the one hundred and tenth meridian shall be paid the sum of seven cents each way for each mile they shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination when the place of examination shall be east of the Mississippi River; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of examination.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that instead of that phraseology he adopt the phraseology that any witness who is obliged to travel, in obedience to a summons, over a certain number of miles shall be entitled to seven cents for each mile he travels. I do not know how it may be, but suppose that witnesses are summoned here from the State of Louisiana, or Florida, or Mississippi, as I understand may be done. It would seem that a rule that applies to those summoned from the distant West ought to apply to them also. I make that suggestion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to such a rule. I fix the limit at the one hundred and tenth meridian, from the fact that that would enable persons to come from all parts of the United States at five cents per mile, except persons west of the one hundred and tenth meridian.

Mr. DAWES. Senators from the distant southern States can tell better than I can whether five cents a mile is a proper compensation for a witness coming from Florida, or Mississippi, or Louisiana. The Senator will see that witnesses from those States would be excluded from the compensation of seven cents a mile, under his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that it is no farther, in my judgment, from my recollection now, from the most distant portion of the Southern States to Washington than it is from the one hundred and tenth meridian, which crosses the country at or near Salt Lake.

Mr. DAWES. I certainly can have no special desire about it. If those Senators who live in those States think that is a proper compensation for those witnesses, I have nothing to say.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether this resolution provides compensation also for the witnesses who may appear and attend at the summons of the committees that have been sent to the Southern States?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Then I will say, so far as my State is concerned, that five cents per mile will not more than just barely pay their expenses, because it is almost all stage-coach or steamer travel.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have compensation besides.

Mr. MITCHELL. Three dollars a day during the time they attend.

Mr. DAWES. They get $3 a day and five cents a mile travel, unless summoned from the place where the committee is in session.

Mr. WEST. Five cents a mile will barely pay them in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state in justification of the amendment I have offered, that the distance for which members of Congress are allowed mileage from my own State is 4,058 miles. The proposition proposed by the committee would make the compensation of witnesses from that State $200 and a fraction over. I will state that that would not pay the actual traveling expenses of a witness from Oregon. I have made a careful calculation of it, and I think in the neighborhood of $250 would pay the expenses of a witness, provided he was very economical in his disbursements in coming from Oregon here, but nothing less would do it. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Suppose a witness is summoned from here to go to Oregon or California, the amendment would not apply in that case?

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution only applies to committees of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. This is not changing the law; it is only fixing a rule for Senate committees. If the Senator from Rhode Island thinks there is any danger of committees going over there and summoning witnesses from here, I think it would be better to provide for it in a separate resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is not any danger of that at all.

Mr. WEST. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add after the word "way," in the eighth line of the resolution, the following proviso:

Provided, That witnesses residing west of the one hundred and tenth meridian shall be paid the sum of seven cents each way, for each mile they shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, when the place of examination shall be east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. DAWES. I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to its present phraseology in order to see that it is right.

Mr. ANTHONY. I merely raised the question. I am willing it shall be settled by those who have the matter in charge. It seemed to me that it provided for paying a witness going a long distance one way and not going a long distance the other way, and the reason given is that there is no occasion to go the other way. I think it may happen, and I think it has happened, that witnesses from here have been summoned by the authority of Congress to go to the Pacific coast.

Mr. MITCHELL. We can provide for that if the emergency arises, but I do not think it is likely to occur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 24, noes 14.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ENTRANCE TO THE CAPITOL.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting suitable temporary plank stairs on the steps of the Capitol.

I beg to call the attention of my friend the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. MORRILL] to this resolution. Those Senators who have had occasion to ascend and descend the steps at the west of the Capitol have noticed that there has been placed there a rickety, shackly, tumble-down thing that has done duty for four or five years. It was a deformity when it was new; and it has been growing worse and worse year after year. I do not think that any respectable farmer in Vermont or Rhode Island would have such an ascent to a crib or a barn, and it is a shame to place it at the entrance of this superb structure. It is necessary to have some wooden steps in order to protect the stone stairs from the ice, but if it cannot be done in a tasteful and elegant way, as it ought to be done, certainly it need not be an unsightly thing as it is now. If there is no money in the Treasury applicable to this purpose I think that the country is not so impoverished that we cannot make a small appropriation for it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

Or to make such provision as shall be necessary to keep the steps in proper condition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I deny that there is any earthly necessity for putting wooden steps there. It may cost a very small sum, a very slight sum, but the ice can be removed almost immediately. Those steps can be kept safe and in a proper condition for a very trifling sum, and it is better that they should be so kept than to be encumbered with anything upon them. That is my idea, and the Senator from Rhode Island accepting that modification, the whole subject will be before the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a conflict of authority among the Sergeant-at-Arms, the architect of the Capitol, and the engineer in charge of the public buildings and grounds, as to who shall have the responsibility for certain portions of the grounds around this building. I recollect, some years ago when I saw a cow trampling down the grass that had just been put upon one of the eastern plats, I sent for one of the officers to have it turned out, but I was very much in the condition in which I believe the royal household of England was when the family were freezing because it was the duty of one high official to lay the fire and the duty of another to kindle it, and neither could act without the other. I went and drove out the cow myself; but I cannot put these stairs up very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CONKLING. This is regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow it to pass.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think it can be passed, from present appearances, without a dozen speeches.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think either the Senator from Maine or myself takes the floor so often or occupies it so long that we ought to be snubbed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly am the last man to do it, especially when the Senator from Rhode Island goes into his own biography and gives his experience as a cow-driver. I certainly must call for the regular order unless the vote can be taken.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I occupy so much more time in this Senate than the Senator from Ohio, and inflict upon it so many more speeches than he does, that I will not say one word upon the question if we can have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been accepted by the mover of the resolution. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2278) to change the name of the port of entry of the district of Teche, in Louisiana, from Brashear to Morgan City;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in reference to congratulations from the republic of Pretoria, South Africa; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relating to congratulations from the Argentine Republic.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-house at Wolf-Trap light-station, in the State of Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the brig A. S. Pennell to the City of Moule; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of the electoral messengers.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry as to the eligibility of J. W. Watts as an elector for the State of Oregon and the circumstances attending the appointment of electors in that State.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall not weary the patience of the Senate by a discussion of the Oregon case, as it has been called, at any great length. I do not rise to pronounce judgment upon that case. My object in rising is to contribute something to the history of that case which ought to be known, and to show that there are two sides, or, at least, that there is another side than that which has been presented in the speech delivered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who, I regret to see, is not in his seat.

This is a resolution of inquiry which instructs the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make certain inquiries and report the results of their investigations and study to the Senate; and I must confess that that being the case, I was a little surprised to find in the RECORD a prejudgment of the whole case by the chairman of the committee who are to be instructed by the resolution to inquire and ascertain what the case is; and not only a prejudgment of the case, but a prejudgment of it in language certainly very severe, not to say offensive, to the gentleman who fills the office of governor of the State of Oregon. The Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the committee who are to be instructed by this resolution, was pleased to say among other things:

In reference to the action of the governor of Oregon it may be said, in the first place, that the determination upon his part that the postmaster, Watts, was ineligible was a judicial question, one that he had no right to decide. I have examined the constitution of Oregon, and it places in the courts the judicial authority. That was a question he had no right to decide. The governor of Oregon had a simple ministerial duty to perform, and that was to certify who had the highest number of votes. Whether the person having the highest number was ineligible was a judicial question that he had no more power to decide than I have, not living in Oregon at all. The question as to whether the minority candidate was elected was a judicial question of a high character. He had no power to decide it. It was a clear usurpation upon his part. Neither the constitution of Oregon nor of any other State that I know of has conferred judicial powers upon the governor. So far as he is concerned with the electors his duty is simply ministerial, that is, to certify who got the highest number of votes. Whenever he goes beyond that he transcends his duty. For him to undertake to say that Watts was ineligible was to exercise judicial power with which he was never invested, and for him to go beyond that and decide that the minority candidate was elected was the exercise of a judicial power which he did not possess, and it was a decision right in the face of the law, a palpable wrong, for which there is no excuse. None can be offered. In one of the southern states of Europe there used to be a custom that when a man was hanged or executed for a crime, or when he was killed in the commission of a felony, he was to be buried by the roadside, and it was the duty of every traveler who went along to throw a stone upon his grave, so that the monument of his crime might be increased from year to year and from generation to generation; and so in regard to this Oregon transaction, every future historian, from generation to generation, will add comment and condemnation upon that act which will increase its magnitude and its infamy to the latest hour.

It cannot be denied that the Senator from Indiana has begun to throw his stone upon this grave, as he supposes, of the governor of Oregon. I say nothing about the propriety of the chairman of the committee who is to be charged by the Senate with making this inquiry thus prejudging the whole of it, and using such language in respect of the governor of Oregon as he has seen fit to use. I do not deny his right to say it, although differing with him upon the question of taste or propriety; but I cannot help saying that it struck me as a little singular that such a prejudgment should be announced before the resolution had even passed the Senate, and that such language should be used toward the governor of that State. I propose to show, without deciding anything, that there is a question here, and that the governor of Oregon has not acted so palpably wrong as to authorize the Senator from Indiana or anybody else to declare that he is infamous and deserves a monument of his infamy to be erected by every one who shall write the history of the country.

Let us see what are the questions involved in this so-called Oregon case. The first question is, was Watts ineligible to appointment as a presidential elector? I do not suppose that there is the slightest difference of opinion among any of the lawyers or any people who read the Constitution upon that point. I understand it to be universally admitted that he was ineligible, not ineligible simply to be an elector, but ineligible to be appointed an elector, and, therefore, his appointment was absolutely void. So far it is all plain sailing, I suppose. In the second place, I suppose it to be equally admitted by everybody that being ineligible to appointment, it does not matter, so far as the question of his right is concerned, whether the voters of Oregon knew of his ineligibility or not, because to say that their ignorance of his ineligibility to appointment would give him a right to hold the office would make their ignorance superior to the Constitution of the United States, which says that he is ineligible to appointment. I read the law the other day as very properly stated in Cushing's Parliamentary Practice; but it requires no authority to show it. It was there stated that where a person is ineligible to election the votes for him are void no matter whether the electors knew of his ineligibility or not, and that must necessarily be so. Otherwise, as I have said, it would make their ignorance confer a title which is directly prohibited by the Constitution.

We have, then, two questions settled by unanimous consent, I take it: first, that Watts was ineligible to appointment, being a postmaster at the time of the election; secondly, that his ineligibility is not at all affected by the knowledge of the voters of Oregon. In the third place, it follows as a necessary corollary from this, that no resignation by him of the office of postmaster could better his title. Being utterly ineligible to appointment and having no title whatever by the appointment, he could not acquire a title by a resignation of his office afterward. All that is too plain, it seems to me, to require any argument; and I do not understand anybody to gainsay it. I understand further that substantially all three of these questions have been unanimously decided by the judges of the supreme court of Rhode Island in a case that arose this very year and in regard to a presidential elector in that State.

We come then to the next question, what was the duty of the governor of Oregon? The Senator from Indiana says that the question whether Watts was eligible or not was a judicial question, and that the sole duty of the governor was a ministerial duty, that he had no judicial function whatever, that it was therefore his duty simply to certify to the person who received the highest number of votes. He states that in the most absolute manner. If his statement be correct, then, if, instead of voting for Watts, the voters who cast their votes for him had voted for Queen Victoria, it would have been the duty of the governor to issue a certificate of election to Her Majesty the Queen that she was chosen elector of President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon; or, as was wittily suggested to me by a republican Senator the other day, if they had seen fit to vote for Goldsmith Maid, who runs better than even Watts, [laughter,] then it would have been the duty of the governor of Oregon to have certified that that brilliant piece of horse-flesh, Goldsmith Maid, was elected elector of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon!

The Senator from Indiana entirely mistakes perhaps what is meant by "judicial functions." It is very true in Oregon, as in every State in the Union and in the Federal Government, that there is a department of government which is called the judiciary and another department called the executive and another the legislative, and the constitutions endeavor to partition out these great powers of government between these three departments; but does it follow from that that no power to judge in any case can be devolved either upon the legislative department or upon the executive department of the government or an executive officer? We could not get along with the Government one day on such an idea as that. The judicial power which the governor of Oregon cannot exercise, which the Legislature cannot exercise, the judicial power that Congress cannot exercise, that the President cannot exercise, is the power of deciding litigated cases that arise in jurisprudence, and is a wholly different thing from the exercise of that quasi judicial power which executive officers are called upon every day to exercise and which they must exercise. Suppose you apply the reasoning of the Senator from Indiana to the Louisiana case; the partition between executive, legislative, and judicial powers in the constitution of Louisiana is as perfect as in that of Oregon; and yet there is a returning board that decides questions of law and fact and upon its decision of questions of law and fact casts out the vote of whole counties or whole precincts. In the same way, where there is a most regular government, where there is no such machinery as this returning board, but where there is a board of canvassers as in every one of the New England States and in every northern State so far as I know, certainly in my own State, where there is a board of canvassers they have to decide many points that involve questions of law as well as questions of fact.

To say, therefore, that this is a judicial question in the sense in which the judicial department of the Government is separated from the executive, as the Senator from Indiana has asserted, is in my humble judgment a confusion of ideas which is not at all warranted by the facts of the case. I shall not, however, undertake to decide that; but I do say that in view of the facts the governor of Oregon might conclude, as I will show before I have done that one at least of the able lawyers of the country did conclude, that he had that power and was bound to exercise it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in his judgment under the law, it was the duty of the governor of Oregon to pass upon the question either ministerially or judicially—I care not which you call it—as to the eligibility of Mr. Watts?

Mr. THURMAN. I said in the outset that I was not going now to pronounce my own judgment upon any of the questions in this case; that my only purpose was to show that there was another side to the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. One other question, if the Senator will allow me; and that is this: If it were his duty to pass upon that question in this individual case, then would it be his duty in every case to pass upon the question of the eligibility of the candidate voted for, provided that question was brought to his notice?

Mr. THURMAN. Well, Mr. President, I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot answer categorically what the duty of the governor of Oregon under her constitution and laws, with which I am not at all familiar, may be. It is sufficient for my purpose, and that is what I said was my purpose, to show that he does not deserve to have the mark of infamy placed upon him which the Senator from Indiana has endeavored to affix, and that there are two sides to this question.

I will say in answer to the Senator now, that if the voters of Oregon had voted for Queen Victoria, in my judgment it would not have been the duty of the governor of Oregon to give her a certificate that she was elected an elector of President and Vice-President for that State. As I said before, I am not familiar with the statutes of Oregon; but I understand that by the constitution or the laws, or both, of that State, these votes are to be canvassed by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor. I do not perceive why the presence of the governor is necessary there, unless it is to see that there is a correct canvass. I may be wrong about that; but I cannot understand it to be so. The governor is to commission the persons found to be elected, or in the case of electors of President and Vice-President he is to make a certificate of their election. The canvass is to be in his presence. Now, I will put a case. Suppose that the secretary of state, opening the returns and making a tabulated statement of them had counted up so many for Watts, and so many for Cronin, Watts being a perfectly eligible person, we will now presume, or so many for A, an eligible person, and so many for B, an eligible person, and the secretary of state had said, "here A has a majority of one hundred votes in the State," and the governor, looking over it should see that there was an error in the addition, and that, in point of fact, B had a majority of one hundred votes; but the secretary should persist in saying, "No, A has the majority; the addition is right;" would the governor of Oregon be bound to issue a certificate to A? Would he be bound to say, "two and two do not make four?" Would he be bound, because the secretary of state obstinately refused to correct his addition, to issue a certificate to the wrong man? I fancy not. I fancy he is there to see that everything is done regularly, and that the persons who are qualified and receive the highest number of votes shall have a certificate. At least, I do not say so absolutely, but I say it may be fairly argued that that is the case.

Well, then, if the governor had any such power at all to decide to whom the certificate should be given, where the person receiving the majority of votes was confessedly disqualified, let us see what he could do. Let us suppose that these returns are being opened; and there is the governor; and my friend, the Senator from Oregon, or the Senator from Indiana, comes to him and says, "Now, governor, in this condition of affairs it is your duty to certify that Mr. Watts is elected." "But," says the governor, "Mr. Watts is confessedly disqualified to be appointed; how can I certify that he was appointed pursuant to the Constitution of the United States?" His certificate must be that the man was appointed pursuant to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Oregon. "Can I say that this man was appointed pursuant to the Constitution of the United States when that Constitution absolutely forbids his appointment?" The Senator from Indiana might say to him "that is a question which you are not to decide at all; that is a question that is to be decided in some other way; Congress is to decide it forsooth when it comes to count the votes. But then the Governor says to him "if it goes on until Congress decides the question, Congress must decide under the oaths of the members to support the Constitution that this man was ineligible to appointment; and by that decision Oregon will lose one-third of her power in the electoral college and in the choice of President."

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. THURMAN. I beg not to be interrupted; I prefer not to be. That would be exactly what the governor might say to him. Now, was it the duty of the governor of Oregon to shear that State of one-third of its power in the electoral college. Certainly that is a question which might well be considered.

If, then, the governor was not bound to certify the election of Watts in direct contravention of the Constitution which declared him ineligible to appointment, perhaps it may be said he should certify only to the election of two electors, and that, as to Watts, he had received a majority of the votes, but that, being ineligible to appointment, he refused to certify to his election. But the governor might say at once, "That raises a most important question of law and of fact. It raises this question of law: in the case of an ineligible candidate, whose ineligibility is known to the voters, is the man who received the next highest number of votes elected? That is a question. You compel me to decide that question. I must decide it, because if I say that there was a vacancy and only two men have been chosen, then I decide either one or two things; I decide that that is not the law in Oregon, or I decide that that being the law, the fact is that the voters of Oregon did not know of the ineligibility." Therefore you see that it would have been impossible for the governor of Oregon to have decided that he would certify to the election of but two men without deciding that it is not the law in Oregon that the man receiving the next highest number of votes is chosen where the ineligibility of the candidate receiving the highest vote is known to the voters, and also without deciding that if that is the law in Oregon, then he must pass on the question of fact and say that the voters of Oregon did not know of the ineligibility of Watts. So you perceive that he has decided no question of law and no question of fact in giving the certificate to Cronin which he would not have been bound to decide if he had refused to give the certificate to Cronin. The thing was forced upon him; he had to decide it one way or he had to decide it the other. At any rate, without saying absolutely that this is so, this strikes me as being so plainly a view of the case that he might take, and that he might without the slightest reproach upon him as a man or as a lawyer, that I do again affirm that he is not subject to the anathemas which have been hurled against him on account of his action.

But, sir, there is still another thing that is to be considered. Suppose he had taken the course that is suggested and certified only to the election of the two who were qualified and about whose election there was no dispute. Then another question immediately arises and that arises under the laws of Oregon and the laws of the United States. Would there in that case have been a vacancy that could be filled by the two certified electors, or would it be a case of a failure to elect, to be supplied by a subsequent election by the voters of Oregon, or by the Legislature of Oregon, or in such other way as her Legislature might provide? That will be found to be perhaps in this case a very important question. It is argued with great force upon the statutes of Oregon, in an opinion which I shall presently send up and ask that the Secretary may read, that ineligibility did not create a vacancy within the true interpretation of the statutes of Oregon, and that if Cronin were not elected it was a case of a failure to elect, which is provided for in section 134 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in these words:

> Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the Legislature of such State may direct.

Mr. CONKLING. What statute is that; the act of 1792?

Mr. THURMAN. No; the act of 1845, now the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes. Let us take this case. Here were two gentlemen, whose names I do not recollect, who were undoubtedly elected. Then there was Watts. Now suppose that between Watts and Cronin there had been a tie, would that have created any vacancy which the other two could have filled up? Would it have been the duty of the governor simply to certify two, and then for those two to go on and fill the vacancy? Is it not apparent that a case like that would be a case of a failure to elect, and that the third person could only then be appointed in such manner as the Legislature of Oregon should direct.

The Senate will see, then, that here are questions that must be considered; they are questions that the governor of Oregon in the discharge of his duty was bound to consider; and now I have to say further upon this matter that, so far as I know the history of this case and of that gentleman, who certainly is a gentleman of high standing, so high that for six years he has been the governor of that State, that the Legislature of that State has chosen him to a seat in this body, and that on the 4th day of March next he will take his seat here—enough, I say, of the history of this case and the character of that man is known to protect him against the imputations that have been so freely lavished upon him. That he acted with great care, that he heard arguments on both sides, that he sought information from all sides, I believe is not denied.

And now, sir, I hold in my hand an opinion of one of the most eminent lawyers of my State, a man who has adorned the bench of the highest court in the city of Cincinnati and adorned the bar of the State for more than thirty years, nearly forty, a man of a perfectly spotless reputation, distinguished for his ability, distinguished for his learning, and, above all, distinguished for his integrity. This lawyer, this judge, who never has been a partisan, who has not acted with the democratic party for many a long year until this year, this lawyer, studying this case as an interesting question, sent his opinion as a citizen of the United States, we all being interested in it, to Governor Grover. Being afterward requested by the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial to furnish a copy of the opinion which he had thus sent, he answered that he had kept no copy; but he would from memory and from his notes furnish as nearly as he could a copy of the opinion that he had sent to the governor of Oregon, with such further additions as subsequent study had enabled him to add to that opinion. This paper is the opinion of Judge George Hoadly, of Cincinnati, and, although it is somewhat lengthy, I venture to say that no Senator who reads it will rise from its perusal without instructing and without satisfaction. I ask that it may be read, and when that is read I shall have said all that I desire to say.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was out at the moment. And I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he stated that this opinion was furnished by Judge Hoadly to Governor Grover?

Mr. THURMAN. You will see in the letter what is stated about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. At whose instance?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know. All I know about it is contained in the letter itself. The letter is published at the instance of the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, a republican as we all know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The paper will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: I should be glad to comply, if it were in my power, with your request to communicate my opinion given to the governor of Oregon relative to his duty in the matter of the presidential election. I wrote three letters to Colonel Pelton, secretary of the democratic national executive committee, on this subject, and forwarded copies of these letters to Governor Grover. I kept, however, no copies myself, and cannot produce them from memory in their original form. Moreover, the subject has been one of constant study on my part since they were written, so that it is impossible for me to produce them as originally prepared. I will endeavor, however, to present to you the arguments which have carried conviction to my mind that Governor Grover has done his exact duty in the premises. This will embrace the substance of the letters referred to, with, however, large additions, the result of subsequent study. I am quite content to bear the odium which may be the result of being considered to have advised the course he took, for I believe he did the right thing, in the right way, at the right time, and with the happiest result, probably the result of preventing a usurping administration, not chosen by the people, and possibly the result of having prevented civil war.

My examination of some parts of this subject is not recent. I was a clerk in the law office of Salmon P. Chase when the Legislature of Ohio passed the famous law of 1848, dividing the county of Hamilton into two representative districts. I became his junior partner on the 1st of February, 1849, during the heat of the contest which arose out of the nullification of that law by the democracy of Ohio. It is within my personal knowledge that Mr. Chase approved from the beginning the course taken by Edward C. Roll, who, as chief clerk of the court of common pleas of Hamilton County, was the returning board of that time, and who, in obedience to his judgment that the law in question violated the constitution of Ohio, gave the certificates of election to George E. Pugh, Alexander N. Pierce, Alexander Long, Henry Roedter, and Edwin L. Armstrong, who had been elected representatives to the General Assembly by the democratic party of this county on general ticket, in defiance of the statute dividing the county for representative purposes. As is well known, Mr. Pugh and his associates obtained and held their seats in consequence of this action of Clerk Roll. John G. Breslin was elected speaker of the house of representatives and Stanley Matthews clerk as the first result. Salmon P. Chase was elected United States Senator, and the black laws of Ohio were repealed as the next result, and thereby it was rendered lawful for a colored man to live and not a felony in courts of justice in Ohio. For this act of independent judgment Mr. Roll was afterward brought to the bar of the court of common pleas, then composed of three whig judges and one democratic judge, and tried for malfeasance in office, but was acquitted by the concurring judgment of the president judge, Hart, with his democratic and one of his whig associates. Since the happy result in 1849 of my lamented friend Roll's independent course, I have never supposed that it was the duty of a returning officer to violate the Constitution of his country or that such violation could be otherwise than mischievous.

The Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 1, provides that each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 136, provides that "It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet." Section 138 provides that "The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President, and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of electors, which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State." Other provisions of the Revised Statutes require the electors to send one of these certificates by messenger and another by mail to the President of the Senate. The third is to be delivered to the judge of the Federal district court for the district in which the electors had assembled. Section 142 is as follows: "Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the certificates, or so many of them as have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons to fill the office of President and Vice-President ascertained and declared agreeably to the Constitution."

I understand the facts to be that on the day of the presidential election, November 7, 1876, John W. Watts, one of the candidates of the republican party for presidential elector in the State of Oregon, was postmaster at Lafayette, the county seat of Yamhill County, in the State of Oregon; that he received a larger number of votes at the election than his highest democratic opponent, E. A. Cronin, but that Lafayette Grover, governor of Oregon, delivered to Cronin the lists provided for in section 136 of the Revised Statutes; that the two republican electors, other than Watts, were named with Cronin as electors in such lists, and that Watts was not named as elector therein; that thereupon the two republican electors whose names were on the lists, either refusing to act with Cronin, or not, in fact, acting with him, accepted the resignation of Watts, elected Watts to fill the vacancy caused by his own resignation, voted for Hayes and Wheeler, and forwarded their certificates without having the necessary lists attached to them; that Cronin elected two other persons to fill the vacancies caused by the non-action or refusal to act with him of the two republican electors, and the college of electors thus created cast two votes for Hayes and Wheeler and one vote for Tilden and Hendricks, and have forwarded the certificates, with the necessary lists furnished by the executive of the State attached, to the President of the Senate and the Federal district judge. It is also to be stated that John W. Watts resigned his office of postmaster on the 13th day of November, 1876. One electoral vote has, therefore, been cast in the State of Oregon in accordance with the forms of law for Samuel J. Tilden for President and Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President of the United States, thus securing them the one hundred and eighty-five votes necessary to elect. Presuming that the principle stated by JOHN SHERMAN, Stanley Matthews, J. A. GARFIELD, and their associates, in their reply to the democratic committee at New Orleans on the 16th of November, 1876, in the following words: "It is, in our judgment, vital to the preservation of constitutional liberty that the habit of obedience to the forms of law should be sedulously inculcated and cultivated, and that the resort to extra-constitutional measures of redress for even actual grievances should be void and condemned as revolutionary, disorganizing, and tending to disorder and anarchy," will not be disputed by any republican in the country, and least of all by JOHN SHERMAN, whose name heads the list of signatures to this letter, and who is to be President of the Senate as is now understood, and thus open the electoral vote, and that therefore Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks will be peaceably declared elected and inaugurated, it is nevertheless an interesting historical question whether Governor Grover did right in investing Cronin with the authority exercised by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to interrupt that reading. For the first time there has been brought to my attention here a roorback published in the World entirely without foundation. I never heard a word of it in the Senate, and I suppose no Senator ever heard a word of it from anybody else. It is false from beginning to end. What! A conspiracy to elect me President of the Senate! a thing I never thought of. But my friend, Judge Hoadly, who has balked about a good deal backward and forward at any rate, seems to have put that in his letter. I wish now, since it is brought officially to my notice, simply to say that it is a mere newspaper roorback, without any foundation of truth in it; and I did not suppose any sensible man in the United States would be deceived by a lie so palpably absurd.

Mr. LOGAN. Is that part of Hoadly's opinion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the reading will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded with the reading, as follows:

That Watts was within the inhibition of the Constitution, and could not therefore be appointed an elector, needs no argument. Nevertheless, as the subject has been once brought before Congress and passed upon by some of the greatest men of the time, I will take the liberty of adverting to the action then had, namely, in 1837. But first let me say that a further question is presented by Watts's resignation after the election, which was considered by Congress at the same time. It appears at the presidential election of the year 1836 several postmasters were chosen electors. This fact being called to the attention of Mr. Henry Clay, the usual motion for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House to count the votes for President and Vice-President being pending before the Senate, Mr. Clay, on the 24th of January, 1837, moved that the joint committee be required "also to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution, and, if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them, and whether any and what provision ought to be made for securing a faithful observance in future of that section of the Constitution." Mr. Clay's amendment was adopted, and the members of the joint committee to count the votes for President and Vice-President, and to discharge the duties required by Mr. Clay's amendment, on the part of the Senate were Felix Grundy, of Tennessee; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; and Silas Wright, of New York. On the part of the House, Francis Thomas, of Maryland; Churchill C. Cambreling, of New York; John Reed, of Massachusetts; Henry W. Connor, of North Carolina; and Francis S. Lyon, of Alabama. This committee reported unanimously to the two Houses as follows:

"The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector, ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution, in order to prevent the officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors, and the disqualification relates to the time of appointment, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution."

In the debate in the House, Mr. Francis Thomas said that the committee came unanimously to the conclusion that they (the postmasters in question) were not eligible at the time they were elected, and therefore the whole proceeding was vitiated ab initio." In the Senate, Mr. Grundy stated that "in some instances not more than four or five electors have been chosen in some of the States who are officers of the General Government, (deputy postmasters,) and that such votes are, in the opinion of the committee, not in conformity with the Constitution. But at the same time the few votes thus given will not vary the result of the election, as it was not contemplated by any one that the appointment of one ineligible elector would vitiate the vote of his State." See Gale and Seaton's Register of Debates in Congress, volume 13, part 1, pages 617 and 698, and part 2, page 1,583. In the case of Searcy vs. Grow, 15 California Reports, 118, the opinion was pronounced by Justice Baldwin, Justice Cope, and Chief-Justice Field, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, concurring. It was a contest for the office of sheriff of Siskiyou County. Grow had been returned as elected to that office. At the time of the election he was postmaster of the town of Yreka, the compensation of which exceeded $500 per annum. The court below found for Searcy, and Grow appealed. The constitution of California provides that no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or in their power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State, provided that offices in the militia, to which there is attached no annual salary, or local officers and postmasters, whose compensation does not exceed $300 per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative." Grow was postmaster at the time of the election, but had resigned at the time of his qualification. The supreme court unanimously confirmed the judgment of the court below.

In the opinion Justice Baldwin says, (page 121:) "The people in this case were clothed with this power of choice. Their selection of a candidate gave him all the claim to the office which he has. His title to the office comes from their designation of him as sheriff. But they could not designate or choose a man not eligible, that is, not capable of being selected. They might select any man they chose, subject only to this exception, that the man they selected was capable of taking what they had the power to give. We do not see how the fact that he became capable of taking office after they had exercised their power can avail the appellant. If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed. We do not see how it can be assumed that by the act of the candidate the votes which, when cast, were ineffectual because not given for a qualified candidate, became effectual to elect him to office." The same principle has been held by the supreme court of the State of Oregon. In the case of McWhirter vs. Brainard, (5 Oregon Rep., 426,) the supreme court of Oregon decided that "the mode of canvassing the vote and the proclamation of the governor are substantially only modes of ascertaining and publishing the result of the vote." As the vote of the people in this case was cast upon the 7th of November, the result of the vote depends necessarily upon the eligibility to appointment as it then existed. It thus appears that Watts was, within the inhibition of the Constitution, incapable of being "appointed an elector," and that the defect was not cured by his subsequent resignation of his office as postmaster.

The duties of the governor of Oregon in the matter of the count are prescribed by the third section of the forty-fourth chapter of the compilation of general laws of Oregon. Oregon General Laws, page 849: "The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed, as the same are given, returned and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary and be the latter delivered to the college of electors, at the hour of their meeting, on such first Wednesday of December." These are the lists that were given by Governor Grover and the secretary of state to the elector Cronin. The method of returning and canvassing the votes for member of Congress is prescribed by section 33, page 766, of the same compilation, which requires county clerks to make copies of the abstracts of votes in their counties, and transmit them by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government, whose duty it is made, "in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and so omit, if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys, and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for either of such offices, and shall issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person."

Does the power to canvass the vote include the power to reject votes cast in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, as, for instance, for a postmaster for elector? To canvass means (Webster) "to examine returns of votes, to search or scrutinize, to canvass votes for senators." A canvass is, as per the same authority, "examination, close inspection to know the state of, as a canvass of votes." To canvass (Worcester) means "to sift, to examine, to scrutinize." A canvass, by the same authority, is "an examination or sifting as of the opinion of others previous to an election." The word comes from the old French word canabasser, "to beat or shake, to examine," and necessarily involves discussion, as is shown by the other meanings of the word, as to canvass a policy, to canvass a district for votes. If in the State of Louisiana, in which by article 73 of the constitution, it is provided that "the judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, in parish courts, in justices of the peace," and in article 94, that "no judicial powers, except as committing magistrates in criminal cases, shall be conferred on any officers other than those mentioned in this title," being the same title which includes also article 73, and in which members of returning boards are not mentioned—if in Louisiana, in which the supreme court has decided that the members of the returning board are officers, (State ex rel. Attorney-General, vs. Wharton, 25 Louisiana Annual, 2,) it be true, as stated in the letter of Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and others above referred to, that "the laws of Louisiana show that the canvassing board is expressly required in certain cases to exercise judicial as well as ministerial functions," I do not see how it can be successfully denied that the canvassing officers of Oregon have the same power.

Upon the question how votes cast for an ineligible candidate are to be considered, two opinions have obtained in the United States. Unless I am misinformed as to the facts of the Oregon case, Governor Grover's action is not in conflict with either of these views.

The first of these found its earliest expression from the lips of one of the greatest lawyers of the revolutionary period, one of the signers of the Declaration, Chief Justice Samuel Chase, of Maryland, the attempt at whose impeachment when a Federal judge furnishes such a large item in the early judicial history of this country. That Chief-Justice Samuel Chase was a lawyer of the first rank, nobody has ever ventured to deny, but his violent temper exposed him to an attack which nearly cost him his high judicial position. In the case of Hatcheson vs. Tilden and Bordley, (4 Harris and McHenry's Rep., 279,) the defendants being judges of the sheriff's election, on the first Monday of October, 1794, declared Jones and Hall duly elected sheriffs of the county of Kent, although Hatcheson had more votes than either of them, on the ground that he was ineligible to election by want of sufficient qualification in real and personal estate, as required by law, whereupon Hatcheson sued Tilden and Bordley in an action on the case for damages for refusing to return him as sheriff elect. Chief Justice Chase, after stating the qualification required by the constitution, says: "All votes given for a candidate not having such qualifications are to be thrown away and rejected as having no force or operation in law. The plaintiff can only be entitled to such votes as were given after he received the necessary qualifications, all votes in his favor previous being illegal and void." The report says that "the plaintiff had received the necessary qualifications about twelve o'clock on the 3d day of the election and from the state of the polls if he had received all the votes taken after that time he could not be elected. Therefore there was verdict and judgment for the defendants."

The subject has been much considered in the State of Indiana. In the case of Gulick vs. New, (14 Indiana Rep., 93,) decided in 1860, the court were unanimous, but the importance of the question led to the expression of two concurring opinions, one by Judge Hanna, the other by Judge Perkins. I need not say to any western lawyer that Judge Perkins is one of the first lawyers in the West. The points decided are expressed in the syllabus thus: "The governor may determine, even against the decision of a board of canvassers, whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that the constitutional prohibition is interposed. If the governor should ascertain that he has commissioned a person who is ineligible to the office, he may issue another commission to the person legally entitled thereto. Where a majority of the ballots at an election were for a person not eligible to the office under the constitution, it was held that the ballots cast for such ineligible person were ineffectual, and that the person receiving the greatest number of legal votes, though not a majority of the ballots, was duly elected and entitled to the office. The mayor of a city, under the general law, has jurisdiction as a judicial officer throughout the county, and the voters of the county are therefore chargeable with notice of his ineligibility under the constitution to any office other than a judicial one during the term for which he was elected."

In both the opinions in Gulick vs. New the judges held, as a principle of public law, that where the ineligibility of a candidate arises from his holding or having held a public office, the people within the jurisdiction of such office are presumed in law to know—are chargeable with notice of such ineligibility. Mr. Grant, in his work on Corporations, page 208, states the rule thus: "A disqualification patent or notorious at once causes the votes given for the candidate laboring under it to be thrown away; the same would probably be held to be the case where the electors had the means of knowledge of the candidate's qualifications, or the contrary, and might have ascertained the facts if they had pleased."

This decision was affirmed in the case of Carson vs. McPhetridge, 15 Indiana, 327, and again in Price vs Baker, 41 Indiana, 572, decided in 1873, the syllabus of which is as follows: "Where a majority of the ballots at an election are given to a candidate who is not eligible to the office, the ballots so cast are not to be counted for any purpose. They cannot elect the ineligible candidate or defeat the election of the opposing candidate by showing that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. It follows that the eligible candidate will receive an office, although less than a majority of the votes are cast for him." The same view was strongly presented in the dissenting opinion of Chief-Justice Thompson, in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pennsylvania Statutes, 270. I quote from page 277: "But I confess my inability to see, if it must be treated as a preliminary question, why, if the constitutional disqualification of the defendant be established, the relator is not entitled to the office. He had votes enough to elect him, if the votes for the defendant be regarded as thrown away. This cannot be disputed. It seems to me this position cannot be controverted: that if the votes cast for the defendant would not confer the office on him, they do not possess the faculty or capacity of depriving the plaintiff of his election, having, as already said, enough votes to elect him. The majority of votes operates only in one direction, namely, to elect, and by electing defeat any competitor; but without electing I deny that the effect is to elect a competing candidate. The thing is not possible. If it were, a majority of votes for a notorious candidate or one notoriously ineligible would defeat an eligible candidate. The elective franchise cannot operate in such a way. If people do not vote generally they consent that those that do may elect. This is the rule in all popular elections. It, therefore, people do not vote for candidates who can by law exercise the offices voted for, it seems to me to follow that they tacitly consent that those who do vote for such as are eligible shall elect on equivalent principles. If such an excuse were good for anything, it ought to be good to render effective the votes for the ineligible candidate, and thus give him the office in spite of the existing disqualification." The same principle was upheld in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Read, (2 Ashmead, 264,) where the defendant (Read) was held to have been elected treasurer by the county board, having received but one legal vote out of twenty cast. The other nineteen were decided to have been void and ineffectual, because they were cast viva voce, and the single vote by ballot to have controlled the election, that being the mode prescribed by law.

Judge Luther S. Cushing, in his work on the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 147, states the rule thus: "In England, where a plurality only is necessary to an election and where the votes are given orally, it is also held that if the electors have notice of the disqualification of a candidate every vote given for him afterward will be thrown away and considered as not having been given at all. The effect of this rule is that not only will the election of a disqualified person be held void, but if such election takes place after notice of the disqualification is given to the electors, the candidate having the highest number of votes will be elected. This doctrine, however hard it may seem, is founded in the familiar principle that every man is bound to know the law with reference to any act which he undertakes to do, and consequently that when an elector is apprised of the fact of disqualification of a candidate and notwithstanding gives his vote for him, the elector takes upon himself the risk of losing his vote if his construction of the law turns out to be wrong.

"SEC. 148. In this country it is equally true that the election of a disqualified person is absolutely void, and in those States where a plurality elects, and where the votes are given orally, as in England, votes given for a candidate after notice of his disqualification are thrown away, and the candidate having the next highest number of votes is elected.

"SEC. 149. In reference to elections by ballot, in which secrecy is the distinguishing feature and in which consequently neither the returning officers nor the electors themselves are supposed to know for whom the votes are given until the result is declared, it seems not unreasonable to consider the votes for ineligible candidates to be thrown away in all cases and the opposing candidate elected where the electors know, or must be presumed to know, the disability, and in all cases where there is no such actual or presumed knowledge to hold the whole proceeding merely void."

The other opinion is represented best by the case of The People vs. Clute, 50 New York, 451, in which the elaborate opinion of the court by Judge Folger is thus summed up in the syllabus:

"A minority of the whole body of qualified electors may elect to an office where the majority decline to vote or where they may vote for one who is ineligible to the office, knowing of the disqualification. Notice of the disqualifying fact and of its legal effect may be given so directly to the voter as to charge him with actual knowledge of the disqualification, or the disqualifying fact may be so patent or notorious as that his knowledge of the ineligibility may be presumed as matter of law; but not only the fact which disqualifies but also the rule or enactment of law which makes it thus effectual must be brought home so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector as that to give his vote therewith indicates his intent to waste it, in order to render his vote a nullity. Where a majority of the electors through ignorance of the law or the fact voted for one ineligible to the office the votes are not nullities; but while they fail to elect, the office cannot be given to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. The election is a failure, and a new election must be had."

As John W. Watts was the postmaster of the county seat of one of the most important counties in Oregon, I presume that the governor and secretary of state, the canvassing board of Oregon, found in point of fact, if they adopted the rule of the case of The People vs. Clute, that this fact was sufficiently notorious to the republican electors of Oregon to charge them, or at least enough of them, with notice of the fact of his ineligibility to bring it within this rule so far as the matter of fact is concerned. So far as the matter of law is concerned a difference is to be observed between this case and the case of Clute, growing out of the fact that the legal disqualification of Watts is not only in the Constitution of the United States, of which no one can be presumed to be ignorant, but that it is a disqualification attached to the very right which the voter was engaged in exercising when he cast his vote for electors of President and Vice-President. It may be true where the disqualification exists in a separate statute, as in the case of Clute, that the elector is not presumed to be aware of the existence of the statute, notwithstanding the rule ignorantia legis excusat neminem; but it cannot be the rule that one who exercises a right derived under the Constitution of the United States can be said to be ignorant of the limitations of that right. It is a familiar principle in the law that he who takes a benefit, whether by statute, agreement, or will, takes it cum onere—that is, subject to all the restrictions attached—and cannot avail himself of the privilege without bearing the burden. Without knowing, therefore, whether the governor of Oregon adopted the Indiana rule or the New York rule, I think I am authorized to presume that if he espoused the New York doctrine he was satisfied in canvassing the votes that a number of republican electors voting for Watts more than equal to Watts's majority over Cronin knew that he was a postmaster, and that the same number either knew or were bound to know of the constitutional disqualification which attached to the office of Watts.

In Great Britain the rule is well established that votes cast for an ineligible candidate must be taken to have been thrown away. The cases are very numerous. The result of them was stated by Lord Denman in 1847, in deciding the case of Gosling vs. Veley, 7 Adolphus and Ellis, N. S., 437, in these words:

"The result of the decisions appears to be this: Where the majority of electors vote for a disqualified person in ignorance of the fact of disqualification, the election may be void or voidable, or in the latter case may be capable of being made good, according to the nature of the disqualification. The objection may require ulterior proceedings to be taken before some competent tribunal in order to make it available; or it may be such as to place the elected candidate on the same footing as if he never had existed, and the votes for him were a nullity. But in no such case are the electors who vote for him deprived of their votes if the fact becomes known and is declared while the election is still incomplete. They may instantly proceed to another nomination and vote for another candidate." (It will be remembered that in England elections are all conducted viva voce.) "If it be disclosed afterward, the party elected may be ousted and the election declared void; but the candidate in the minority will not be deemed ipso facto elected. But where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise, and therefore, however strongly he may, in fact, dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted—that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector. His presence counts as such to make up the requisite number of electors, where a certain number is necessary, but he attends only as an elector to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as elector; he can speak only in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing; any other act is merely null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he withdraws from the choice of A, who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other qualified. He has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only; and but for this rule the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or the corruption of electors who must seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If then, the elector will not exercise the election of A in the only legal way, he throws away his vote by directing it where it has no legal force, and in so doing he voluntarily leaves unopposed and assents to—the voices of the other electors.

"Where the disqualification depends on a fact which may be unknown to the elector, he is entitled to notice, for without that the inference of assent could not be fairly drawn, nor would the consequences as to the vote be just. But if the disqualification be of a sort whereof notice is to be presumed, none need expressly be given; no one can doubt that if an elector would nominate and vote only for a woman to fill the office of mayor or burgess in Parliament, his vote would be thrown away; there the fact would be notorious, and every man would be presumed to know the law upon the fact.

"It follows from these observations that the true ground of the decision is that stated by Lord Mansfield in the case first cited (Rex vs. Foxcroft, 2 Burr. 1021): 'Whenever electors are present who do not vote at all, they virtually acquiesce in the election made by those who do.' In that case the numerical majority contented themselves with protesting against the election of him for whom the minority voted. In the case of Taylor against The Mayor of Bath, 3 Luders, 324, the counsel in argument took the distinction between not voting at all and voting for a disqualified candidate. They admit that silence might be held to give consent, but that voting for the other candidate was an express negative; it was the only way, they said, of voting against one to vote for the other. But the court overruled the distinction; to vote for a person not qualified, they said, was the same thing as not to vote at all, which it was admitted would have been a constructive assent."

Lord Campbell held the same doctrine in very vigorous language in the case of the Queen vs. Coaks, 3 Ellis and Blackburn, 249. "I must say," said he, "that this appears to me to be a very plain case. It is allowed that it depends on the right of Cundall to act as a councilor on the 9th of November, 1852. If he had a right so to act at that time, the present defendant is not duly elected. Now, as to Cundall's right, who was elected a councilor on the 1st of November, 1851, the case is just the same as if Blake had not been the candidate on that occasion. To be sure, he did stand, but then he was ineligible, and that fact was known to the voters. It is a principle of all election law and of good sense that persons who knowingly throw a vote for an ineligible candidate throw away their votes just as much as if they voted for the man in the moon."

In another report of the same case, namely, 18 Jurist, part 1, page 378, Lord Campbell's language is reported thus: "This is clear; it is allowed that it depends upon whether Cundall had a right to act as city councilor of Norwich on the 9th of November. If he had a right so to act, the present defendant was not duly elected mayor, and is a usurper, and the quo warranto properly issued. Cundall was elected a city councilor on the 4th of November, 1851; it is the same as if Blake had not been a candidate, because he was ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors, and if the voters know that a candidate is ineligible, they throw away their votes when they vote for him. They do not vote.

"This is good corporation law, good parliamentary law, and good sense, and there is nothing in statute 6 and 7, William IV, chapter 76, to alter it. Then, Blake's votes being disregarded, Cundall had the greatest number of votes, and he legally elected, he ought to have been returned as one of the city councilors." The latest discussion of this subject in England is found in the case of Drinkwater vs. Deakin, Law Reports, 9 Common Pleas, 626.

The same principle has been decided in Ireland in the case of Trench vs. Nolan, Irish Rep., 6 Common Law, 464, where the court of common pleas held that "votes given to a candidate who is disqualified, after notice of that disqualification had been given, are thrown away." The same rule was followed in 1875 in the celebrated case of the Tipperary election, Irish Rep., 9 Common Law, 247, where John Mitchel and Stephen Moore were the only candidates for member of Parliament in the county of Tipperary. Mitchel received 3,114 votes and Moore 746. John Mitchel having been convicted in 1848 of treason-felony and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, having escaped and been naturalized as a citizen of the United States, it was held that he was disqualified to be elected a member of the House of Commons, and that notice of his disqualification having been brought home to the electors who voted for him, their votes were thrown away, and the rival candidate, though numerically in the minority, was entitled to the seat.

Questions similar to those under discussion have often come before legislative bodies and have been variously decided. In the opinion of Judge Folger in the case of The People vs. Clute, in the opinion of the majority of the court by Judge Strong and in the dissenting opinion by Chief-Justice Thompson in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Cluly, the opinions of legislative committees and legislative bodies are not considered as entitled to much respect. It was claimed in the argument of the case of The People vs. Clute, by Mr. Paige, that a majority of the opinions of this kind are in favor of the rule that votes cast for an ineligible candidate are to be treated as votes thrown away. I conceive that much depends in such cases upon the character of the office, as well as of the language of disability. For instance, one entertaining the views that I do may well hold that votes cast for an ineligible candidate for a representative office at least have the effect of preventing an election, for the reason that the office being in its character representative, the officer being during his whole term the spokesman or representative of the people, the candidate receiving the minority can never fulfill the function, and, therefore, can never be declared elected. Such is not the English doctrine, for they are in the familiar habit of seating members in Parliament who received the minority vote where the majority was cast for a disqualified candidate, but it seems to me more consonant to the spirit of American institutions, and that neither the view expressed by the Indiana supreme court and by Chief-Justices Chase and Thompson, nor that of the court of appeals of New York, ought to apply to an election to a representative body, as the Senate and House of Representatives, on the simple principle that a minority can never elect a representative of the whole people. But a presidential elector is not a representative. On the contrary, to treat him as such is a violation of the letter of the Constitution as well as of its spirit and of the known purpose of its founders. The ineligibility of a Federal office-holder to the office of elector must be determined in view of the character of that office as it was understood by the framers of the Constitution, and not by any change of opinion in regard to the character of that office which has since occurred. Again, the language of disqualification varies in various cases. A Federal officer is not eligible to be "appointed." The fourteenth amendment disqualifies those who are within its provisions, not from appointment, but, on the contrary, uses those words:

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, but Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."

Here the disqualification attaches not to the appointment and relates not to the date of the appointment, but to the act of holding the office, and thus to the date of performing its duties. So that a person subject to the disqualifications of the fourteenth amendment may well be appointed, and if eligibility be conferred on him before the time for performance of its duties, may enter upon such office. Therefore votes for a person thus disqualified, as in the case of Vance in the United States Senate, and in the case of General Frost in Missouri, cannot be treated as null and void, but at the most create a vacancy if the disqualification be not removed before the time for the performance of duty in the office has arrived.

I will take the trouble of calling your attention to another question cognate to the above. Suppose votes given for Watts were not to be rejected as null and void, and the doctrine of the Indiana and Maryland cases do not apply; and suppose that these votes cannot be rejected under the rule established by the case of The People against Cook, then a third question is presented, was there a vacancy in the office of elector, and was there a failure to elect which can be treated as a vacancy?

It seems to me perfectly clear that either Cronin was elected or there was no election and no vacancy which could be filled by vote of the other electors, and that the same is true of the election of Sollace in Vermont, and in several other cases of the election of Federal office-holders which have occurred. I come to this conclusion by a consideration of the Revised Statutes of the United States. On general principles, to make a vacancy, it requires that there should have been an office to which some one has been elected. It cannot be said, I suggest, though I have not examined the question fully, that if the people fail at the first election to an office to choose any one, there is, in any proper sense of the word, a vacancy in that office. There has been simply a failure to fill the office. But whether this be so or not, that the omission to elect an elector by the people does not constitute a vacancy is made perfectly clear by a comparison of sections 133 and 134 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Section 133 is in these words:

"Each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors, when such college meets to give its electoral vote."

Section 134 provides that "whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the Legislature of such State may direct." These sections treat vacancies as being something quite different from failure to make a choice on the day prescribed by law. In the cases of Watts and Sollace, either their highest competitors were chosen or there was a failure to make a choice on the day prescribed by law. If there was a failure to make a choice on the day prescribed by law there is no doubt that, under section 134, the number of electors not chosen might be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the Legislature of such State might direct. But as this is a distinct provision from that for filling of vacancies in section 133, this appointment cannot be made under a provision of law adopted by the Legislature for filling vacancies, for the filling of vacancies is one thing and failure to elect is another, under these statutes; and if the Legislatures of Oregon and Vermont have never provided (they certainly have not in Oregon, whatever may be the case in Vermont—as to which I am not informed) for the case of failure to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, then certainly, if Cronin's and Sollace's highest competitors were not duly elected, at least the vote cast under pretense of filling the vacancy cannot be counted. In Oregon this view is confirmed by the provisions of the Oregon statutes relative to the filling of vacancies. They are in these words, (General Laws, chapter 45, section 2, page 849:)

"The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college; and when all the electors shall appear and the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled, as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Had the Legislature of Oregon intended to authorize any vacancy, however caused, to be filled by the electors present, they would not have used the words, "If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." These words, "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend or otherwise," are entirely superfluous upon this theory. For the sentence would then have read: "If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college." The use of these words, "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," indicates that there are cases of vacancy which the electors may not fill, and this view is strengthened by the character of the vacancies thus described, the three named—death, refusal to act, and neglect to attend—being all the result of events occurring after the election. The words "or otherwise," upon canons of interpretation well known to every lawyer, cannot enlarge the preceding words so as to make them apply to every case of vacancy, but only refer to other like cases depending upon conditions similar to the enumerated cases. The maxim applicable is noscitur a sociis. So a statute treating of "deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, and others having spiritual promotion" is held not to extend to bishops though they have spiritual promotion, deans being the highest persons named, and bishops being of a still higher order. (1 Blackstone's Comm., 88.) In the Ohio mechanics' lien law a similar case of construction is found. The law provides that a subcontractor may serve on the owner an attested account of any sum due him from the contractor, which the owner is required to deduct and pay to the subcontractor out of his subsequently accruing indebtedness to the contractor, and section 6, R. S. & C., 834, provides that "if, by collusion or otherwise, the owner of any building erected by contract as aforesaid shall pay to his contractor any money in advance of the sum due on said contract," he shall be liable to the subcontractor in the same manner as if no such payment had been made.

During the thirty years that I have been a member of the Ohio bar I have known it contended many times, but always unsuccessfully, that these words "or otherwise" had the effect to include the cases of advance payments, rendering the owner liable, so that he might be charged by the subcontractor in any case of advance payment; but the decisions have been uniformly to the contrary. It has always been held that the words "or otherwise" referred to the contextual word "collusion," and meant collusion or other like or deceitful or fraudulent advance payment, and that for the reason that to read it as claimed is to read the statutes as if the words "by collusion or otherwise" were eliminated from it. So, too, the construction proposed will make the Oregon statute read as if the words "or otherwise" had never been introduced into it.

Allow me in conclusion, although not called for by your request, to express the hope that by adopting the principles of civil-service reform, by making the tenure of all Federal officers dependent on good behavior and not on political opinion, by providing that no officer shall be dismissed except for cause, both parties in our country may remove from our presidential elections that which makes them so dangerous, namely, the fact that a political change in the Presidency is followed by what the New York Nation properly calls the most cruel, undeserved, and excessive punishment to thousands of families, namely, withdrawal of their means of support, often as now in the hardest of times.

Yours, respectfully,

GEO. HOADLY.

To the EDITOR OF THE COMMERCIAL.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the third amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees; and that the House had agreed to the first and second amendments of the Senate to the said bill with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4204) to remove the political disabilities of William Sharp, of Norfolk, Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4149) to remove the political disabilities of Lloyd J. Beall, of Virginia.

COMMITTEE ON COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave to offer a resolution which simply provides for the reference of the message of the House of Representatives about the electoral vote, which I ask may lie over until Monday, and I offer it merely—I do not suppose it is at all necessary under the rule—to guard against the possibility of a single objection carrying the matter away from our consideration on Monday. That is my only object in offering the resolution; and the resolution of the House, if the Chair will lay it before us, I will move to have laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution of the House of Representatives:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are differences of opinion as to the proper mode of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and as to the manner of determining questions that may arise as to the legality and validity of returns made of such votes by the several States:

And whereas it is of the utmost importance that all differences of opinion and all doubt and uncertainty upon these questions should be removed to the end therefore that the votes may be counted and the result declared by a tribunal whose authority none can question and whose decision all will accept as final; Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, to act in conjunction with any similar committee that may be appointed by the Senate, to prepare and report without delay such a measure, either legislative or constitutional, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the desired end, that said committee have leave to report at any time, and that the Clerk of this House inform the Senate of the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table, if there be no objection; and printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And printed. The resolution which the Senator from Vermont now offers will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the presidential election be referred to a select committee of some seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result; and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives hereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that it lie over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4124) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees; and

On motion by Mr. WINDOM,

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. DAVIS were appointed the conferees.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 4204) to remove the political disabilities of William Sharp, of Norfolk, Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1874) granting a new register to the schooner Carteret—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 3256) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin & Brother, of Park County, Indiana—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 2278) to change the name of the port of entry of the district of Teche, in Louisiana, from Brashear to Morgan City—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 4149) to remove the political disabilities of Lloyd J. Beall, of Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in reference to the congratulations from the republic of Pretoria, South Africa; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relating to congratulations from the Argentine Republic.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry as to the eligibility of J. W. Watts as a presidential elector in Oregon and the circumstances connected with the appointment of electors in that State.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I rise with no intention to prejudge the questions which are involved in this resolution, but to endeavor to present to the Senate some of the conclusions toward which my own mind is tending in regard to this important and interesting question. At the outset it is well and proper, it seems to me, that we should be careful in the judgment we pass upon the governor of a State within the performance of a grave, high, constitutional duty. It is just to remember the obligations under which he acts; it is just to remember that he is bound by an oath; and we are bound to believe that he acted conscientiously. No accusation of wrong, no charge of wilful misbehavior should, it seems to me, be sustained by us against a man clothed with high official functions, vested by the people of his State with the executive authority thereof and chosen by its people to a seat in this Hall unless plenary proof, conclusive evidence thereof, be furnished to us by those who make the charge. The presumptions are in his favor, and it is our duty to believe that he acted conscientiously in the performance of his functions until the contrary plainly appears.

Under what obligations has he acted? As governor of the State of Oregon he has acted under the obligation of an oath to support the Constitution of the United States which it, by its own terms, imposes. That instrument in clause 2 of article 6 provides that—

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

In recording this oath he accepts the solemn obligation that so far as his official duties go not the laws of Oregon nor Oregon's constitution, but the Constitution of the United States, shall be to him the supreme law. What is the provision of this supreme law in regard to this question? It is found in clause 2 of article 2, thus:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator, or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

This is the supreme law. It is not a statute law nor the constitution of Oregon, but it is the Constitution of the United States that is made the supreme law. The power of the State to appoint its electors is fully given by this clause, but accompanying the power follows the inhibition "no elector shall be appointed who holds an office of trust or profit under the United States." We learn as an undisputed fact that the State of Oregon has attempted to appoint under its own laws, made in pursuance of the Constitution and laws of the United States, the number of electors to which she is entitled, but she violates the inhibition enjoined upon her by selecting as one of her electors a person who enjoys an office of trust and profit under the United States. This is the undisputed condition of the question as now presented. Or it may be stated thus: The State has appointed its electors under its own laws, but in doing so it has violated the supreme law.

The law of the State and the act of Congress concur in this, that they give to the executive of the State exclusive power to certify the appointment of the electors. I read from the Revised Statutes of the United States on that subject:

SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required, by the preceding section, to meet.

The law of the State as quoted by the Senator from Oregon gives the governor of the State the power to canvass and to certify the vote, and thus it and the law of the United States concur in giving to the governor the exclusive power to certify the appointment of the electors. The governor, thus vested with the power, recognized by the Constitution and the laws of the United States and of Oregon as the power to canvass and to certify, performs his duty. He canvasses the vote, he certifies the lists, and in so doing he obeys the supreme law and refuses to certify for the disqualified official.

The responsibility is cast upon the governor, he is called to the performance of a plain duty, and in its performance he recognizes the binding obligation of his oath to obey the paramount law. The ordinary mind can grasp the whole of this proposition. There are no technical rules, no fine-drawn distinctions, needed in judging of what is the duty of a conscientious man under such circumstances. On the one hand is the plain letter of the supreme law and the oath of the executive, on the other a candidate plainly ineligible with a majority of votes. He obeys the former and holding the votes for the ineligible candidate to be void certifies for the minority candidate. If this be an error he has erred in obedience to his desire to obey his oath and to give representation to his State.

Who complains? A postmaster sworn to obey the Constitution of the United States, who was bound to know that he was ineligible. The governor says, in explanation of the manner of the performance of his duty, that law and fact concur; that the oath and the Constitution go hand in hand in making the man who seems to have a majority ineligible. Is it not just and proper to take his statement upon this subject? The legal question then is an unsettled question. Is it not as plain a duty on the part of the governor to obey his oath to support the Constitution of the United States as it is to give a certificate to an elector in violation of both the Constitution of the United States and his oath? I do not propose now to discuss the main question, but simply to ask, is there any case decided in the United States courts, either on original or appellate jurisdiction, which holds the doctrine contended for adversely to the governor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania—I take it for granted, of course, that he has examined the law on this question and the facts—whether, in his judgment as a lawyer, it was the duty of the governor of the State of Oregon to adjudicate upon the question as to the eligibility or non-eligibility of Mr. Watts as an elector?

Mr. WALLACE. It is as plainly his duty to recognize the binding force and effect of the supreme law which overrides the law and constitution of Oregon as it is to give a certificate in violation of both.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is not an answer to my question. I want to know of the Senator from Pennsylvania as a lawyer, whether, in his judgment, under the law, it was the duty of the governor of Oregon to adjudicate and pass upon the question as to the eligibility or non-eligibility of Mr Watts as an elector.

Mr. WALLACE. As executive of the State he was bound to take notice of the fact that there was an ineligible candidate and refuse him his certificate. The agency of the governor on this subject has, as the Senator will see when he comes to hear what follows in my argument, is perhaps that of an agency of the General Government acting in behalf of his State. His duties may be purely ministerial, but there is another tribunal that will correct him, if he errs therein. I ask the question, is there any authority settling this question either on appellate or original jurisdiction decided by any of the courts of the United States? I find none. This is a question of United States law, not of State law; I need scarcely say to the Senate that when a State court has settled a question even affecting one of its own citizens that involves a construction of the Federal Constitution that that construction by the State court is not binding upon the courts of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. I inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania if there has ever been any construction by the supreme court of the State of Oregon upon the Federal Constitution on this question or on the laws?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know anything about that, and it is not necessary to the line of argument which I propose to follow that I should know. The proposition I make is that this is a question of United States law and not of State law, that the inhibition in the Constitution of the United States is broad and full. It in substance is, are the votes void? Who has the right to settle that question? What rule of construction applies? Here is a provision of the Federal Constitution penal in its character to be construed. Does the rule of the common law apply? It is but a short time since we heard protests from the Senator from Indiana against the application of the common law to a provision of the Federal Constitution somewhat penal in character. Is the rule that of State construction, or is it that of Federal interpretation? My mind leads me to the conclusion that this matter is to be settled by Federal interpretation, and not by the constructions of the State courts. I reach that conclusion because I believe that if this question were raised by quo warranto, for instance, it would find its ultimate tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States. If there were a contest between two men as to who should fill the office of elector, certainly it could not be settled by the law of Oregon; it would gravitate, necessarily, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there be settled. Next, the inhibitions here contained are upon an agency of the State, but that agency is a part of the machinery of the Federal Government itself, without which it cannot exist; and, as a necessary consequence, it follows that the power of the agencies, the courts or the political tribunals of the Federal Government, to discuss, to judge, and to settle any legal question arising therefrom, must remain in full force. If the States alone could control this subject, they could nullify the plain terms of the Federal Constitution in this regard.

Again, the great end to be reached is the culmination of the popular will in the counting of the vote. There is power given here to some agency of the Federal Government to reach that end. The words of the twelfth article are:

The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The votes shall then be counted.

How? If that power be given, the means necessary to the attainment of the end inevitably and necessarily follow; they follow by necessary implication. Just as under the clause "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," the means are implied to summon witnesses, to examine elections, to judge of eligibility, and to provide the machinery that surrounds a contested-election case under this provision; so under the power here expressly given to count the vote there is necessarily implied the means and the power to learn whether it is the vote of that State, and to learn whether it be cast by those who are not prohibited by Federal law from so doing.

The Senator from Indiana takes up the cases to convict the governor, and he cites them seriatim. As I have already said, no case construes this provision of the Federal Constitution. No case is cited from Federal authority. The People vs. Clute, in New York, was a case of ineligibility arising under State law. The case of the Commonwealth vs. Cluly, in Pennsylvania, was a question of the ineligibility of a sheriff under the State constitution. The question in the case of Crawford vs. Dunbar, the recent California case, was one arising under the constitution of the State of California. The case from 12 Georgia was a case of non-residence. The case from Kentucky was one arising under the constitution of that State, and the case in 14 Wisconsin was a question of naturalization under the act of Congress.

These are the principal cases cited by Senators in proof of their position. I am therefore justified in my assertion that there is no case cited and no doctrine implied from any of them that can control, direct, or settle the interpretation of the Federal Constitution, but that it is to be settled hereafter by some tribunal acting as an agency of the Federal Government and in an enlightened view of the whole subject. I am sustained in this view by the report of Messrs. Grundy, Clay, and Wright in 1837.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to go through? I will answer anything he has to say at the end of my argument. This report made in 1837 came from three men no less famous than Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright. In that report the committee say:

> The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried in its whole spirit into rigid execution in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

They thus hold that this provision of the Constitution should be carried into rigid execution; and are we to hold that the rules of the common law, or the rule of construction by State courts of their own constitution, are to take away from the Federal courts—to take away from this tribunal if it be the one vested with power to judge on this subject—the right to determine and to settle this question? I cannot agree to such a conclusion. I want to hear the facts, to determine our jurisdiction, to grasp this important question in the full light of the grave results that now impend, and so advised to calmly judge.

I have stated that the law is unsettled, and in such a condition of things, with this provision of the Federal Constitution unconstrued, is it not just and wise and proper to give at least a hearing to the other side before animadversions and attacks are made upon the governor and those who act with him?

But another question in this case presents itself to my mind. I make the suggestion for what it is worth, as I have reached no final conclusion on the subject, but I am inclined to believe that there are but two electors lawfully appointed by the State of Oregon. The Revised Statutes fix the time of appointment by the State. This is found in section 131. Section 133 provides as follows:

> Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

What, now, is the statute of Oregon? The Senator from Oregon reads it and, I believe, reads it correctly:

> The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

So that this provision of the act of Congress, section 133, is carried into full force by the provisions of the Oregon statute; and this brings us to the question: What is a vacancy? It is a place unfilled. This is the common interpretation of it as applied to an office; a place unfilled. Before a vacancy can happen in any office it must once have been filled. That is the common-sense meaning, the ordinary interpretation of the word. To assert that a vacancy in an office has been filled implies that it previously had an incumbent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether that was the interpretation put upon the word "vacancy" by Mr. Buchanan, and by his law advisers, and by his democratic predecessors in filling up appointments created by law for the first time, after the Senate had adjourned, that had never been filled in the world?

Mr. WALLACE. It is not necessary to go into any political question at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a political question. I am looking after great precedents and asking my friend for information.

Mr. WALLACE. I will give the Senator the authorities upon which I rely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But will not the Senator answer my question?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator, perhaps, has the advantage of me in his assertion of that being a precedent. I do not know whether it was or was not, but, certainly, no court in the land has established any such doctrine; certainly, there has been no such authority given here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator quite sure of that?

Mr. WALLACE. I believe that I am; I do not know. The Senator is at liberty to correct me if I err. I quote now from the cases cited in Brightly:

> There can be no appointment to fill a vacancy until the office has once been full (Ex parte Dodd, 6 English, 152.) In that case Johnson C. J. said: "We consider it perfectly clear that the vacancies contemplated necessarily presupposed that the offices had been once filled, and that the provision for filling those vacancies was solely designed to embrace the unexpired portion of the term that might remain after the happening of such vacancy." And see Johnston vs. Wilson, 2 N. H., 202. This question has been the subject of discussion in the Senate of the United States, and the doctrine of Ex parte Dodd is that held by them. In the year 1814 President Madison granted commissions to ministers to negotiate the treaty of Ghent, in the recess of the Senate. The principle acted upon in this case, however, was not acquiesced in, but protested against, by the Senate, at their succeeding sessions; and on a subsequent occasion, (20th April 1822,) during the pendency of the bill for an appropriation to defray the expenses of missions to the South American states, it seemed distinctly understood to be the sense of the Senate, that it is only in offices that become vacant during the recess the President is authorized to exercise the right of appointing to office, and that in original vacancies, where there has not been an incumbent of the office, such a power, under the Constitution, does not attach to the Executive. And in a report of the committee of the Senate, made on the 25th April, 1822, it is declared that the words "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate" mean vacancies occurring from death, resignation, promotion, or removal.—Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections, pages 677, 678.

Judge Story takes the same view and lays the law down in the same way, (section 1559.) But this is not all. What is a vacancy in office that may be filled is defined by the statutes of Oregon thus:

> Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:
> 1. The death of the incumbent;
> 2. His resignation;
> 3. His removal;
> 4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town or village, for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
> 5. His conviction of any infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
> 6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
> 7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.—General Laws of Oregon, chapter 13, title vii., section 45, pages 709, 710.

These are the seven classes of vacancies authorized to be filled, or declared to be vacancies under the laws of Oregon itself. If this be the declaration by the laws of Oregon of what is a vacancy, then a failure to elect is not a vacancy, and if the doctrine of the cases cited by the Senator from Indiana is sound, it inevitably follows that there is a failure to elect. Mr. Watts was ineligible, the election failed, and there was no vacancy to fill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania hold that the governor of Orgeon decided that there was a failure to elect?

Mr. WALLACE. I have made no such assertion. I am simply giving the law of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. I would prefer that the Senator should wait until I get through.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the Senator from Pennsylvania understand to be the facts of the case as to whether or not the governor of Oregon decided that there was or was not a vacancy?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know anything about the facts further than as they are admitted. I am simply discussing the question as a pure, naked question of law. I assert that there is a distinction in the laws of the United States between a vacancy that may be filled by the election and a failure to elect; and if there is not a plain distinction in the mind of the Senator, I cannot get it for him. There is a failure to elect. That is the doctrine of all the cases quoted by the Senator from Indiana. Ineligibility, they say, produces a failure to elect; there is no election. What follows? The difficulty then comes within the case contemplated by the provisions of the act of 1845. The act of 1845 fixes the time for choice of electors, and the first proviso to it was in these words:

> Provided, That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

There is the case of a vacancy. Next comes the other case:

> And provided also, When any State shall have held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and shall fail to make a choice on the day aforesaid, then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the State shall by law provide.

This is found in section 134 of the Revised Statutes, thus:

> Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the Legislature of such State may direct.

First, notice a double proviso in the act of 1845, and this is simply carried into the Revised Statutes. Why a double proviso? In the one case a vacancy; in the other a failure to elect. If Watts was ineligible and Cronin was not elected then there is clearly a failure to elect, and it comes within the provision of section 134, and the Legislature must provide the means of appointing the elector who has not been chosen.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator please allow me to conclude what I have to say?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EATON.) The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. WALLACE. I am only arguing to its conclusion a legal proposition; why does the Senator desire to interrupt me? The Senator will have an opportunity to follow me.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator declines to yield, I of course submit.

Mr. WALLACE. The constitution and the laws provide for the appointment of electors by the State. They provide for the filling of vacancies where there has been a choice of an elector; they provide for the appointment of an elector in the case of a failure to elect, but in a totally different manner. The electors cannot appoint the one whom the people failed to elect; it must be done as the Legislature provides, and in Oregon the Legislature has made no provision and hence my mind inclines to the belief that there are but two electors legally appointed in the State of Oregon, and that no such vacancy has occurred as authorizes the electors to fill the place; but, on the contrary, it is a failure to elect, and the Legislature of Oregon has not provided means by which this failure to elect shall be supplied.

I reach these conclusions from the written law. I am subject to correction; I may be in error, but I read the law as I find it. Why is section 134 found in the Revised Statutes? If Cronin is not elected and Watts is not elected, then evidently there is a failure to elect, and then the Legislature of Oregon has not provided the means to fill the third place. That is a conclusion that cannot be escaped from if my view of the law be the correct one.

Mr. President, I have deemed it worthy of the time I have occupied to bring these facts and this condition of the law to the notice of the Senate. If I have taken the time of the Senate improperly, I have simply to apologize for so doing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I had not intended to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the questions involved in the resolution pending; but from the course taken in this debate I feel compelled to devote a little while to a consideration of some of the points involved.

We have presented the singular spectacle in this discussion of a case wherein no man, no Senator, nobody, so far as I am advised, raises any question in regard to the vote of the people of the State of Oregon in the recent election. It is not denied, so far as I am advised, by any Senator on this floor, by any man anywhere of any political party, that a majority of the legal voters of the State of Oregon, at the recent presidential election, cast their votes for the electors on the republican ticket. It is alleged, however, publicly proclaimed, generally believed by everybody, that the governor of the State of Oregon, instead of signing the lists which the laws of Oregon required him to sign, certifying to the fact that certain persons had received the highest number of votes, has refused to do that thing, and has issued his certificate of election to one person, admitted by all to have received less than a majority of all the votes cast for presidential elector in that State. I am not surprised that Senators on this floor decline directly to come to the point and defend the action of the democratic governor of the State of Oregon. I am not surprised that the honorable Senator from the State of Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the able and eloquent champion of the democratic party in this honorable body, should decline to assume positively and directly the defense of the action of the democratic governor of the State of Oregon. I am not surprised that in the speech which he has just made to this honorable body he has shielded himself behind the opinion of a lawyer in Cincinnati; that, instead of coming up boldly to the front, before the Senate, before the people, before everybody interested in this great question, he has shielded himself and his position behind the opinion of a man who, probably, for $50 or $500 could have been employed to prepare and deliver an opinion upon the other side much stronger, much abler, much more to the point.

The question, Mr. President, I propose to discuss, is as to the right, as to the power of the governor of the State of Oregon to assume jurisdiction and pass upon the eligibility of Mr. Watts as one of the presidential electors of the State of Oregon. He has assumed to entertain jurisdiction upon that point and to adjudicate in reference to that matter. Is there a Senator on this floor who is willing to come to his defense to-day and to defend his right to do what he has done in reference to that matter?

I have no set speech for this occasion; I have no written speech for to-day. What I want to know from the democratic party of the United States of America, represented upon the floor of the Senate of the United States, is, whether any member of that party is willing to rise in his place to-day to affirm the right of Governor Grover of Oregon to adjudicate upon that question; and I pause for a reply. Not one rises. Not a democrat within the sound of my voice, not a Senator of the United States belonging to the democratic party dare rise in his place to-day on this floor, and upon law, and justice, and right defend the action of the democratic governor of Oregon in his refusal to issue a certificate of election to the person selected by a majority of the votes of the people of Oregon, and in issuing it to a man whom the majority of the people of the State of Oregon decided they did not want as an elector. Am I wrong in my assertion? I pause again for a reply. No Senator from Senator THURMAN down dare rise in his place to-day upon this floor and defend upon law, upon principle, upon justice, the action of the governor of the State of Oregon. I pause again for a reply. They dare not do it. No man who is a lawyer can defend it. It was a gross usurpation of power, a willful violation of law, an attempt upon the part of one official to set at defiance and trample under foot the expressed will of the majority of the people of one of the States of this Union. Does anybody deny it? Does my friend from Ohio deny it? Can he defend it upon the law, upon the facts? He cannot. In the discussion of this question the honorable Senators upon the other side have ignored the fact that the appointment of electors by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States of America rested with the State of Oregon, that it is to the Legislature of that State that is delegated the power of providing the manner in which electors shall be appointed. The Constitution of the United States, in article 2, provides that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

Now let us examine what the Legislature of the State of Oregon has done in reference to this matter; let us examine what the powers of the executive of the State of Oregon are under the constitution of that State, and then we shall be enabled to determine as to the character of the action of Governor Grover in refusing to sign the list as provided by the law. I call attention in the first place on this point to article 1, section 1, of the constitution of the State of Oregon in regard to the distribution of powers among the different departments of the government of the State of Oregon. Article 3, section 1, provides as follows:

> The powers of the government shall be divided into three separate departments, the legislative, the executive, including the administrative, and the judicial; and no person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another except as in this constitution expressly provided.

I call attention also to article 22 of the constitution of the State of Oregon for the purpose of showing what the powers of the executive of that State are under the constitution of that State, because it will be admitted by every person that his powers are defined and circumscribed and controlled by the provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon. Section 1 of article 7 provides:

> The judicial power of the State shall be vested in a supreme court, circuit courts, and county court, which shall be courts of record, having general jurisdiction to be defined, limited, and regulated by law in accordance with this constitution. Justices of the peace may also be invested with limited judicial powers, and municipal courts may be created to administer the regulations of incorporated towns and cities.

Now I call attention to section 9 of the same article; which provides as follows:

> All judicial power, authority, and jurisdiction not vested by this constitution or by laws consistent therewith, exclusively in some other court, shall belong to the circuit courts; and they shall have appellate jurisdiction and supervisory control over the county courts, and all other inferior courts, officers, and tribunals.

I understand that the democratic party is a strict adherent to the doctrine that the powers parceled out by the General Government and by the constitutions of the State governments to the different departments of those governments should be circumscribed and kept within their respective boundaries at all times and under all circumstances, and upon that question I desire to read from Story on the Constitution, section 520:

> In the establishment of a free government, the division of the three great powers of government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial among different functionaries, has been a favorite policy with patriots and statesmen.
> Especially with democratic statesmen—
> It has by many been deemed a maxim of vital importance, that these powers should forever be kept separate and distinct. And accordingly we find it laid down with emphatic care in the bill of rights of several of the State constitutions. In the constitution of Massachusetts, for example, it is declared that "in the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men."
> Again, the writers in the Federalist lay down this doctrine:
> The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

No Senator upon this floor will take the position that under these several provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon, the governor of that State can exercise judicial power. It is claimed, nevertheless, by indirection, by the opinions of outside men, by employed attorneys if you please, that the governor had the right to exercise judicial functions. My point is that under the laws of Oregon, under the constitution of the State of Oregon, judicial power does not belong to the governor of that State; he has no right to exercise judicial power in reference to the matter of elections; he is a mere ministerial officer; his duties are defined; they are imperative; they are emphatic, by the terms of the constitution, and by the terms of the law, and he has no right to go behind these several provisions.

In what I am about to say, I do not intend to enter into the question of the eligibility of Mr. Watts as an elector. I do not enter into the question at all, so far as his appointment is concerned; whether, if a majority of the votes were cast for a person who was ineligible, therefore the person who was eligible was elected, although he had only a minority of the votes. I desire to confine my argument for the time being to the question of the power of the governor of the State in the premises, and I undertake to say here to-day, without fear of successful contradiction, that the powers of the governor of the State of Oregon, under the Constitution and under the laws, are ministerial purely; that they are not judicial; that he has no power to entertain the question as to whether or not Mr. Watts was eligible as an elector of President of these United States. That is the point I desire to make, and I undertake to say that in assuming to exercise that power the governor of the State of Oregon violated the plain and express provisions of the constitution of his State and of the laws passed in pursuance thereof. That is the point upon which I stand here to-day ready to answer any question that may be propounded by any Senator of the United States upon the other side of this House. They have evaded this question in the discussion that they have presented to the Senate and to the country. They have ignored the constitution of the State of Oregon and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. If he had the power to entertain this question and to pass upon the eligibility of Mr. Watts as a presidential elector, then it must be conceded by the gentlemen on the other side of the House that he would have the power to entertain any suggestion that might be made in regard to the ineligibility of any person elected by the people of the State of Oregon to any office for which he is to issue his certificate. What would this lead to? I desire to attract the attention of the Senate to this point.

I ask the attention of my honorable friends on the other side of the house to certain provisions of the constitution of the State of Oregon, and the first to which I attract their attention is section 9 of article 2, which provides as follows:

> Every person who shall give or accept a challenge to fight a duel, or shall knowingly carry to another person such challenge, or who shall agree to go out of the State to fight a duel, shall be ineligible to any office of trust or profit.

Now, the question I want to propound to my democratic friends is this: Suppose a person who is a candidate for the office of State treasurer, if you please, in the State of Oregon receives a majority of all the votes cast for that office in that State. The secretary of state, under his duty, decides that he has received a majority of all the votes cast for State treasurer, and before the governor has signed his certificate of election a suggestion is made to the governor that the person so elected has been guilty of a violation of this provision of the constitution of the State of Oregon, to wit: that he had given or accepted a challenge to fight a duel, or that he had knowingly carried to another person such challenge, or that he had agreed to go out of the State to fight a duel. I want to know if my democratic brethren on the other side of the house think the governor of the State of Oregon could adjudicate on that question. Could he exercise judicial functions? Could he pass upon that question? Could he determine whether this man, so elected by a majority of the votes of the people, should not only be disfranchised but much worse than disfranchised, by holding that he should not have the right to a certificate of election to the office for which he had been selected by the people? If the governor of the State of Oregon had the power to decide upon the eligibility of Watts as an elector, then, as a matter of course, he would have the power to decide upon the eligibility of a man selected by a majority of the people in reference to whom it had been suggested that he was guilty of sending a challenge to fight a duel.

But not only so; I call your attention further, Mr. President, to section 10 of article 2 of the constitution of Oregon, which provides as follows:

> No person holding a lucrative office or appointment under the United States or under this State shall be eligible to a seat in the legislative assembly; nor shall any person hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, except as in this constitution expressly permitted; provided that offices in the militia, to which there is attached no annual salary, and the office of the postmaster, where the compensation does not exceed $100 per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative.

Will my democratic friends contend that the governor of the State of Oregon can assume judicial functions and pass upon the question on the suggestion of a mere partisan, if you please, that a person selected by a majority of the votes of the people of the State of Oregon is at the same time holding a lucrative office or appointment under the United States or under the State? Does that kind of power belong to the executive of the State of Oregon? Where does he get it?

But this is not all. Section 11 of the same article of the constitution of Oregon provides as follows, and I call especial attention to this provision:

> No person who may hereafter be a collector or holder of public money shall be eligible to any office of trust or profit until he shall have accounted for and paid over, according to law, all sums for which he may be liable.

Suppose a man was selected for the office of secretary of state or of state treasurer or of district attorney, if you please, under the constitution of the State of Oregon by a majority of the voters in that State, and the secretary of state, under his duty, should decide in the canvass of the votes that such person had received a majority of all the votes cast, and yet before the governor signed the certificate, which the law says emphatically he shall sign, some partisan, some man, I care not who, should come in and by affidavit or otherwise suggest to the governor of the State of Oregon that such person was ineligible to his office under section 11 of article 2 of the constitution of the State for the reason that he had been a collector or holder of public money and that he had failed to account for and pay over according to law all sums for which he was liable? Will my democratic friends contend that the governor of the State of Oregon has the power under the constitution and laws to entertain jurisdiction of that question, to investigate that question, to determine that question? No lawyer on the other side of this House will for one moment assume any such position before the Senate or before the country. Why? Because in the first place the office of governor of the State of Oregon in reference to this matter is merely and purely ministerial, and because again there are other insuperable, insurmountable objections to any such assumption; and what are they? The right to hold office under the Government is one of the highest rights that can attach to the American citizen. How is he to be deprived of that right on any allegation of ineligibility? By the mere ipse dixit of an executive officer? Not by any manner of means. Only by the adjudication of the judicial department of the Government; by that and by that alone. What does the constitution of the State of Oregon say on that subject? I turn to the bill of rights and I find in the seventeenth subdivision of the bill of rights of the constitution of the State of Oregon this provision:

> In all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

Am I, on a mere suggestion of my political adversary, when I have received a majority of the votes of the people of my State, to be disfranchised and deprived of holding an office of honor and trust and profit by the mere ipse dixit of the executive officer of my State in reference to my ineligibility under that clause of the constitution which says that "no person who may hereafter be a collector or holder of public money shall be eligible to any office of trust or profit, until he shall have accounted for and paid over, according to law, all sums for which he may be liable?" I take it not. I take it that upon that question I have a right to demand, as the constitution of Oregon says, a trial by jury; and yet the policy suggested, not defended, by the leaders of the democratic party on this floor, because they cannot defend it, would say that I was at the mercy of the executive of my State, that my rights as a citizen of this country were to be determined by an executive officer of the State, when the constitution of my State says that "in all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." What does it mean when the constitution says that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate? There is a clause something like that, if I remember rightly, in the Constitution of the United States, not exactly the same, but substantially this, that in all suits at common law the right of trial by jury shall be preserved where the value in controversy is over $20.

Upon that point I call attention not only to subdivision 17 of the bill of rights of the constitution of the State of Oregon, but I call attention to the Constitution of the United States, article 7; also to Parsons vs. Bedford, 3 Peters, 439; Webster vs. Reid, 3 Dallas, 297, and to 11 Howard, 437, for the purpose of showing that these provisions include not merely modes of proceeding known to the common law, but all suits not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction by which legal rights are settled and determined. What higher legal right could be suggested than the right to exercise the duties of an office when the majority of the people have selected such person as the person to exercise such office? Therefore, Mr. President, when it is asserted here by implication, because it is not asserted directly, that the governor of the State of Oregon, a mere executive officer, a mere ministerial officer, has the right to pass judicially upon a question as to the eligibility or non-eligibility of this man or that man for whom a majority of the votes of the people of the State have been cast, it is to assume a position that cannot be maintained or defended either here or elsewhere.

But, Mr. President, was the action of Governor Grover in assuming to entertain jurisdiction as to the eligibility or non-eligibility of Mr. Watts the assumption of judicial power? I assert that it was. I assert that it was the exercise upon his part of judicial power of the gravest character. What did he assume? He assumed that there was no vacancy in the election of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States. Now, I desire to call your attention to the laws of the State of Oregon upon this question, by which it will be conceded that Governor Grover should be bound. I cite first section 45 of title 7, page 709 of the code, as to the manner in which vacancies may be created in the State of Oregon:

> Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:
> 1. The death of the incumbent;
> 2. His resignation;
> 3. His removal;
> 4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
> 5. His conviction of any infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
> 6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
> 7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.

Then, under the constitution and laws of Oregon, if a person who is ineligible is voted for by the people of that State for any office, how is that election to be declared void? By "the decision of a competent tribunal." Governor Grover assumed to be that "competent tribunal." I assert that he had no power to assume that position or to take any such position; but he did take it. Now I intend to follow to the end the legitimate results of such a position. He assumed to pass upon the question of the eligibility of Mr. Watts. We all admit that he did pass upon that question. He decided that Mr. Watts was ineligible. What was the result under the laws of Oregon? It was to create a vacancy. How under the laws of Oregon was that vacancy to be filled? Was it to be filled by the governor? Is there any Senator on this floor who can point out to me any authority for the governor of Oregon to fill a vacancy in the office of presidential elector? Not one. Why? Because the matter of the appointment of presidential electors is left to be appointed in such manner as the Legislature may direct. The Legislature of the State has provided that in case of a vacancy it shall be filled how? By the governor? No, sir. By the judges of the supreme court? No, sir. By whom? By a new election? No, sir. By whom? By the electors that have been elected. That is the law.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator read the law which authorizes the electors to fill a vacancy, if that be the case?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will with the greatest of pleasure. I will read from section 2 of the act of October 24, 1864, to be found on page 849 of the General Laws of Oregon, and it reads as follows:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. Does the Senator contend under that law that the two electors who were legally elected beyond all doubt could fill what he calls a vacancy there where there had been no election at all? If there had been no election there was no vacancy; or if it may be so called, can that be the vacancy contemplated by law?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not assume or concede that there was no election, so far as that is concerned; and even if I were to concede that, I would still contend that there was such a vacancy as might be filled by the electors who were elected, because the language is broad.

Mr. BOGY. The reading of that law is that where the elector has been elected, but owing to death, resignation, sickness, no matter what may be the cause, he is unable to reach the place where the college meets, so that there is then a vacancy, the others may fill it; but where there is no election at all—I am perfectly fair in my inquiry because I think this one of the great points, and perhaps the point of this case at last—how can a vacancy of that kind, if it can be called so at all, be filled? As I have understood, a similar case occurred in Vermont and there the Legislature met and supplied by law the omission. The same thing occurred in Rhode Island and there the Legislature met and supplied the vacancy itself. That it is competent for the Legislature to do so I do not deny, because the Constitution says that electors shall be elected in the manner provided by the State Legislature, and they might have appointed anybody to cast votes for electors; but there is no provision of that kind here. You are relying on that law when according to my understanding of that law, though I may be wrong, it is not a vacancy contemplated by it where there has been no election.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know what the Legislature of the State of Vermont may have done out of abundant caution and to cover any objection. I am here, though, to answer the Senator's question because he has asked me a perfectly pertinent question. I am not here to say what the Legislature of Vermont may have done out of abundant caution; at the same time I am advised that the laws of the State of Vermont were entirely different from those of the State of Oregon and the Legislature of Vermont made them the same in this respect when it was called together.

I undertake to say that the statutes of the State of Oregon have provided for the filling of any vacancy that may occur in the office of presidential elector from any cause whatever, and that it is the duty of those electors to fill that vacancy. Everybody knows, the Senator from Missouri will admit, that Oregon is entitled to three presidential electors. Now, even conceding for the sake of the argument, which I do not admit as matter of fact, that there was no election in the case of Watts, I still contend that under that clause the two persons who were elected had the power to fill that vacancy, that there was a vacancy, and they not only had the power but it was their duty to fill it.

I assume in the first place that the governor of the State of Oregon had no power to exercise judicial functions; that he had no power to entertain the question suggested to him, no matter by whom, as to the eligibility or ineligibility of Mr. Watts; but, as a matter of fact, as history tells us, he did assume to exercise that power? What is the result? He assumed to pass upon the question as to whether or not the election of Mr. Watts as one of the presidential electors was or was not void; he assumed that he was the "competent tribunal" specified in the statutes of the State of Oregon who should pass upon that question. I say he had no power to do it; but he did it and I now take him at his word, and where does it leave him? He adjudicates that question; he decides that Mr. Watts was ineligible. What then? What follows legitimately? That there is a vacancy in that office; and then the question arises under the constitution and the laws, who has the power to fill that vacancy? Is it the governor? Is it the chief justice? Is it the people of the State of Oregon by a new election? Or is it, as the statute plainly and unequivocally provides, the two men who were elected electors and in reference to whom there is no controversy? They had the power to fill the vacancy, and not the executive.

So, Mr. President, I care not what may be said about the eligibility or non-eligibility of Mr. Watts, in no possible event had the governor of the State of Oregon the right or power under the constitution and the laws to undertake to say that somebody else was elected. I undertake to say that any such action on the part of the executive was usurpation, a violation of law, an indefensible act upon his part that will stand while history stands as an official iniquity in this centennial year which neither time can efface nor posterity condone. What does he do? In the face of the law, in the face of the constitution, which distributes the powers of the different departments to different offices of the government of that State, what does he do? He not only undertakes to exercise judicial functions and to determine as to the question of the eligibility of Mr. Watts, but he goes further and decides what? Decides that Mr. Cronin, a man whom the majority of the people of the State of Oregon selected to stay at home, should cast their vote for President and Vice-President of these United States. That is what your democratic governor of the State of Oregon has done. Are you his defenders? Is it defensible, either upon the law or upon the facts, in reason or upon justice? I take it that it is not. He issues the certificate to Mr. Cronin, and what does Mr. Cronin do? In this connection I call your attention to the law as to the duties of the persons selected as electors; and in that connection I will call attention to the action of Mr. Cronin. Section 2 of the act of October 24, 1864, provides as follows:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college; and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Governor Grover issued his certificate to Mr. Cronin, the man whom I have said the majority of the people of Oregon elected to stay at home, and what does he do? He undertakes to comply with section 2 of the act of October 24, 1864, and what is that? He undertakes to convene; to convene himself. For the purpose of showing how indefensible the action of the governor of Oregon is, I have already called attention to section 2 of the act of October 24, 1864, in reference to the convening at the seat of government of the electors.

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government.

This certificate was issued to Mr. Cronin, as we are told, and Mr. Cronin convened and declared two vacancies and proceeded to fill them. Webster defines the word "convene," as follows:

To come together; to meet; to unite.

Again:

To come together; to meet in the same place; to assemble.

Just imagine my friend Cronin coming together with himself; imagine him meeting himself, uniting with himself, coming together with himself, meeting together with himself in the same place, assembling with himself! Again Webster defines the word "convened," as follows:

Assembled, convoked.

Imagine my friend E. A. Cronin "assembled together" for the purpose of what? Of electing a President of these United States of America. "Convoked!" E. A. Cronin convoked for the purpose of giving the casting vote in reference to the election of a President of forty-five millions of people! Again, a "convener" by Webster is defined, although the word is obsolete, as—

One who convenes or meets with others.

Just imagine! It reminds me of Dundreary, who, in his sapient application of various homely proverbs, such as "a wise child," &c., says "Birds of a feather flock together;" and his feeble intellect is impressed with the idea and he comments upon it by saying "Flock together! flock together! Of course they do. Who ever heard of a fool of a bird that went off in a flock all by himself?" [Laughter.] Unfortunately we have heard of that fool of a bird in this case who went off in a flock by himself, who convened by himself, who assembled with himself, who met with himself. I am not surprised that my friends on the other side of this House failed to come to the rescue. I am not surprised that they shelter themselves behind the opinions of this lawyer and that lawyer, written perhaps for pay, who have not the honor of holding seats here, for the purpose of defending by indirection the act of the executive of a great State that is indeed perfectly indefensible in any point of view.

What does the statute say further?

The electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.

Did the men who framed that law contemplate any departure from the principles laid down by Dundreary? Certainly not. They never supposed that one fool bird would flock together all by himself. They had no conception of it at that time; but by the phrase the "electors present" they contemplated what? As a matter of course that more than one should be present.

By the way, I have a decision upon that question rendered within the last few days by a very high court in England. I refer to the supreme court of judicature in England, which has been but recently organized to fill the place of the House of Lords in this respect. It is one of the first cases they have decided, and I ask the Secretary to read the report of that case from the London Times of November 22, 1876. It is a law report:

House of Lords, Nov. 21—appeals.
Supreme court of judicature—court of appeals.
Sittings at Westminster before Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge and Lords Justices Mellish, Brett, and Amphlett.

The case is that of Sharp vs. Dawes. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SHARP VS. DAWES.

In this case the very novel question was raised whether one shareholder in a company could by himself constitute a "meeting" for the purpose of making calls and transacting business generally where there was no provision in the rules for a "quorum." The action was brought for the amount of a call upon certain shares, which call was made at a meeting, duly convened, of a company transacting business in the Stannaries, on the cost-book principle, under 32 and 33 Vict., cap. 19. Proper notices had been given under the rules, of a meeting to be held on the 30th of December, 1874. On that day, at the time of the meeting, only one shareholder attended. He took the chair and passed several resolutions, including a call of 4s. per share upon the capital of the company and ending with a vote of thanks to himself as chairman. The action was tried by Baron Bramwell, without a jury, on the 26th of May last, and the question as to the validity of the call was reserved for the Queen's Bench division, where Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Quain decided that, the meeting having been properly convened, the resolutions passed there by the single shareholder were valid.

On appeal, Mr. Holl, for the appellant, argued that there could be no "meeting" unless at least two shareholders "met" each other. It was merely an abortive attempt at a meeting.

Mr. Brown, Queen's counsel, and Mr. Lane, for the respondents, argued that the meeting was properly convened, and therefore was valid. The shareholders vote according to the value of their shares. Therefore, this one gentleman, if a few other shareholders with a less number of shares had come in, could have out-voted them and passed resolutions. Was he to be deprived of this right because they refused to come. The conditions precedent to make it a meeting had been fulfilled.

Lord Justice MELLISH. You admit that if no shareholder had attended there would have been no meeting?

Lord COLERIDGE. No, he does not, if the conditions precedent have been fulfilled.

The learned counsel urged, if no one is there, of course, nothing can be done. But if one is there he can transact business. The word "meeting" is used in a technical rather than in its popular sense.

Lord COLERIDGE. The question is, what does the word "meeting" mean within the act 32 and 33 Vict., cap. 19? No doubt, it might be that the word might include an assembly of one within the meaning of some particular act, but there are no words here to show that it is used otherwise than in its usual signification. In ordinary language a meeting must be more than one. Therefore, I am of opinion that in this case there was no valid meeting.

Lord Justice MELLISH. I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that if no shareholders come there is no meeting, and I do not see why one should constitute a "meeting" more than none. We must adhere to the plain meaning of language. Lords Justices Brett and Amphlett concurred.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I think that ought to dispose of any serious question that might be raised in regard to the propriety or authority of one person undertaking to convene, to assemble together with himself, to have a convocation in regard to the transaction of business. I do not suppose that any Senator on this floor will treat that with any kind of seriousness. I do not understand that any Senator on this floor is here to-day to defend for one minute the action of Governor Grover in undertaking to issue a certificate to Mr. Cronin. If any such defense is to be made, I should like to hear it; I should like to know it. I was a little surprised, and gratified at the same time, at some statements made by my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] yesterday. I quote from the RECORD:

Why, Mr. President—

it is a new feature introduced into the American Constitution and the American system of government. We did think once that the only question about an election was, who has a majority of the votes? That is what we thought; that is what our fathers thought when they made our Constitution; but that is not the question any more. The question is not who has the majority of the votes, but who has the majority of the men who count the votes.

Mr. MITCHELL rose.

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather not yield just now.

If you have a returning board with a majority ready to count out democratic candidates and count in republican candidates, they have a power as great as the tribunes of the Roman people had to veto the voice of the people; not simply to veto what the people have done, but to determine what the people ought to have done, according to their judgment of what they think to be best. That is it, sir.

Sir, what the Senator from Ohio said yesterday is applicable to the case under discussion to-day. We did think at one time, all of us, republicans and democrats, that the only question was as to what the majority of the people had determined; but, as the Senator from Ohio says, the question now is, when applied to transactions that have recently taked place in the State of Oregon: "Not who has the majority of the votes, but who has the majority of the men who count the votes." In the States of Louisiana and Florida and South Carolina there was a question before the American people as to whom the majority of the people of those States gave their votes for President and Vice-President. Is there any such question with reference to the State of Oregon? Does any man or any Senator or anybody deny that a large majority of the people of that State gave their votes for the republican candidate for presidential electors? No such suggestion has been made here.

In what I have said to-day I have not argued the question at all in regard to the eligibility or non-eligibility of Mr. Watts. That was argued in extenso heretofore by abler men in this body. I care not what the general rule is upon that question; I plant myself upon the constitution of the State of Oregon and upon the laws passed in pursuance thereof, and I assert that the governor of that State, in assuming the exercise of judicial functions, in attempting to pass upon the eligibility of Dr. Watts, transgressed the law, usurped power, attempted, if you please, by fraudulent practices to set aside and trample upon the will of the majority of the people of one of the great States of the American Union. I say it does not belong to him to pass upon that question, whatever way the question should be decided; and in assuming to entertain jurisdiction of that question he has transgressed the law; he has not only undertaken to trample upon the will of the majority of the people of his own State, but by the same fraudulent practices he has attempted to override the constitutionally expressed will of a majority of the great States of this Union in reference to the selection of the Chief Magistracy of forty-five millions of people. That is what I say, and if I am wrong I want to be corrected now.

But Senators upon the other side of this question who have discussed it have not only ignored the constitution of the State of Oregon and the laws of the State of Oregon, they have talked about abstract questions, they have shielded and sheltered themselves behind the opinions of lawyers who have either volunteered opinions upon this question or who have been paid for the same. I take it for granted that Mr. Judge Hoadly of Cincinnati has acquired all the fame that he ever expected to achieve by his opinion to Governor Grover. He has obtained the notoriety of having his opinion read from that desk to go forth before the people of this country.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate longer. My friend from Ohio yesterday [Mr. THURMAN] referred to the Roman tribunes who exercised the power of not only defeating the will of the senate and of the people, but who assumed the right to determine what the people ought to have done. Yes; but a check came to that, let me tell my friend from Ohio. There was a certain Tiberius Gracchus in Roman history who inaugurated the policy that an appeal should be taken to the people from the Roman tribune who should undertake to veto the decision of his associates or the decision of the Roman senate. That policy was inaugurated three hundred years before the Christian era, and if we have a Roman tribune to-day in Oregon who would assume to override the will of the majority of the people of that State, I propose that we have another Tiberius Gracchus, who will appeal to the people, to the people not only of the State of Oregon but the people of this whole country; and in reference to their decision on this question I have no fears. To that tribunal I cheerfully submit the question, and the more cheerfully from the fact that my democratic friends on the other side of this Chamber, instead of coming out openly and above-board and defending the action of their democratic governor in the State of Oregon, seek only to defend that action by indirection, shielding themselves behind the opinions of irresponsible men. Mr. President, it is very late and I shall not detain the Senate further now. I shall have more to say however in reference to other aspects of this case.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. HARVEY. Will not the Senator yield for a short executive session?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will give way for the motion.

Mr. HARVEY. There is a reason for it which I can explain to the satisfaction of every Senator present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 15, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONGRATULATIONS ON NATIONAL CENTENARY.

Mr. SWANN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present two reports which it is very necessary should be acted on at once. I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report to this House a communication received in July last from the republic of Pretoria, South Africa, and referred by the House of Representatives to this committee. In response to the complimentary action of the republic of Pretoria, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to communicate said action to the Secretary of State with the request that (with the approbation of the House of Representatives) we return the acknowledgments of this Government to the republic of Pretoria for the very complimentary terms in which the said republic has referred to the first centennial of our national independence, and our high appreciation of the compliment conveyed in said communication.

In connection therewith the Committee on Foreign Affairs have unanimously adopted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the republic of Pretoria the high appreciation by the House of Representatives of the complimentary terms in which said republic has referred to the first centennial of our national independence in their resolutions to this House in May last.

THO. SWANN, Chairman.

The report was adopted.

Mr. SWANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SWANN. I now ask the Clerk to read the other report which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following dispatch having been communicated to the Congress of the United States, July 11, 1876, from the Argentine Republic—

To Congress:

Argentine Congress, inspired by the sacred remembrances to-day raises in freemen's souls, heartily congratulates your Congress on the glorious centenary of that great country.

Given, Congress in session:

MARINO ACOSTA CARLOS GAVARIA,
Secretary.

BUENOS AYRES, July 4—and the same being referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I am instructed by said committee to report the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be and is requested to acknowledge said dispatch and the high appreciation of the House of Representatives of the compliment intended to be conveyed.

THO. SWANN, Chairman.

Mr. KASSON. As this report is intended to be an answer on the part of our Government to a compliment extended to the United States, I ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] whether our action should not be in the form of a concurrent or joint resolution which would represent the whole Government of the United States. I observe that by the language of this report the acknowledgment is by the House alone, though the communication is to the whole people and the Government of the United States. If the committee have considered this question, of course that should be satisfactory. I only suggest the question whether this resolution of acknowledgment which is to be transmitted to a foreign government ought not to be so framed as to represent both branches of Congress by concurrent or joint resolution.

Mr. SWANN. The Secretary of State is the medium through which the Committee on Foreign Affairs have communicated whatever may require his attention. These reports came to our committee during the recess of the House and we have had no time to give them any very extended discussion.

The committee, however, have taken no action in reference to the matter as to whether the resolution should be a joint resolution or whether the response should be made through the Secretary of State. We are under the impression that a communication of the sense of this House to this Argentine Republic through the Secretary of State would answer the purpose for conveying the recognition of the United States of the very complimentary manner in which the centennial anniversary of this Republic has been referred to.

Mr. KASSON. I agree with the gentleman as to the propriety of the resolution, and the only suggestion I have made has been in reference to the form in which it should be passed.

Mr. SWANN. We looked upon the Secretary of State as the channel through which this communication should be made.

Mr. HOAR. A question as to the propriety of the expression used in the last resolution has occurred to me, and I therefore ask that it be again read.

Mr. KASSON. I ask also that the communication referred to be again read.

The report and resolution were again read.

Mr. KASSON. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, this recognition comes from the Congress of our sister republic to the Congress of the United States, and therefore I think my honorable friend from Maryland will see the propriety of having the answer from the Congress of the United States, which can be done by a slight change in the wording of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. SWANN. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest by common consent that the gentleman from Maryland be allowed to make it a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives," &c.

Mr. SWANN. We have no objection to that at all, as it accomplishes the purpose we have in view.

Mr. HOLMAN. It might be better to have the response read as it will stand amended.

Mr. KASSON. It is only provided that it shall be in the form of a joint resolution: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled," &c.

Mr. SWANN. There is no objection to that amendment. I will make it a joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) in response to congratulations from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Maryland, in view of the change in the form of the resolution will take the amendment and prepare it himself. The words "intended to be" should be stricken out.

Mr. KASSON. Let them be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The amendment suggested will be made if there be no objection.

There was no objection and it was ordered accordingly.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the resolution already adopted in reference to the Republic of Pretoria was modified to take the form of a joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in reference to the congratulations from the Republic of Pretoria.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF WILLIAM S. ROBINSON.

Mr. TARBOX, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of the legal representatives of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts, for reference to the Committee of Claims.

The bill was taken up, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TARBOX moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund, to the following named persons, who have been employed at piece work in the folding-room of the House from September 1, 1876, the same amount per annum, less 10 per cent., as was paid the same class of employés of the Forty-third Congress, from the above date to December 15, 1876: C. L. Freeman, W. W. Lester, N. Dawson, W. H. Minix, Patrick Jordan, C. T. Lewis, W. F. Weeks, J. H. Walters, J. N. Wiggins, Allen Wood, C. W. C. Dunnington, J. M. Buchanan, B. E. Hambleton, S. M. Freeman, J. L. Knight, H. T. Murry.

HENRY HADLEY.

Mr. WALKER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4200) granting a pension to Henry Hadley, late a private of Company G, Eighty-sixth Volunteers, New York State Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TECHE DISTRICT.

Mr. KEHR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2278) to change the name of the port of entry of the district of the Teche, in Louisiana, from Brashear to Morgan City, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that the name of the port of entry of the Teche district, in the State of Louisiana, be changed from Brashear to Morgan City.

Mr. HOLMAN. This I understand is but a change of name?

Mr. KEHR. It is simply to have the name of the port of entry conform to the name of the municipality and post-office in that locality.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that be all, there is no objection to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEHR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM BOWEN.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4201) for the relief of William Bowen, of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. LOGAN AND W. L. SHADWICK.

Mr. REA, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 890) for the relief of John S. Logan and W. L. Shadwick, for reference to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. REA moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUTUAL FIRE-INSURANCE COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4202) to amend the charter of the Mutual Fire-Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF C. W. M'CORD ET AL.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles W. McCord and Reuben McCord; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM SHARP.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4204) to remove the political disabilities of William Sharp, of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODE. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill may now be put upon its passage.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the usual petition accompany the bill?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

LLOYD J. BEALL.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 4149) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Lloyd J. Beall, of Virginia.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The word "legal" should not be in the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. It is merely in the title of the bill. I ask that by unanimous consent the words of the title of the bill "legal and" be stricken out.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CONGER. Does the usual petition accompany the bill?

Mr. HUNTON. The usual petition accompanies the bill, and it has been unanimously approved by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

CATHARINE SHEETS.

Mr. VAN VORHES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4205) granting a pension to Catharine Sheets, widow of Daniel Sheets, late captain of Company C, Seventeenth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to her minor son, Willie Sheets; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMOS WHITEHAIR ET AL.

Mr. VAN VORHES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4206) allowing a pension to Amos Whitehair and Eliza J. Whitehair, children of Emery D. Whitehair, late a private of Company F, Third Regiment West Virginia Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

F. E. SHEPPERD.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4207) to remove the political disabilities of F. E. Shepperd, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, and the Senate amendments referred to that committee, with amendments both to the Senate amendments and to the original bill.

I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the bill as it passed the House appropriated the sum of $21,000 to meet the expense of three committees appointed by the House to make investigations in regard to the late elections for President and Vice-President of the United States in the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. The Senate amended the bill by adding an additional section appropriating the sum of $50,000 for investigations in the States named and also the State of Mississippi by committees of that body. The Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to make the report which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide "for the expenses of certain special committees," together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was referred, having considered the same, beg leave to report, and do report, as follows:

They recommend concurrence with the amendment numbered 1 with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the bill strike out the words "twenty-one" and insert in lieu the word "thirty," and after the word "Florida" in line 7 of the bill insert "and of the committee of five appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, to examine into any alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress." And after the word "the" in line 4 of the bill insert "actual," and after the word "expenses" in the same line insert "necessarily incurred."

They recommend concurrence with amendment numbered 2, (being section 2,) with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "thirty," and in line 4, after the word "the," insert the words "actual and necessary," and in line 5, after the word "elections," insert "and other expenses necessarily incurred."

Mr. HOLMAN. That the House may be fully informed of the effect of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, I ask that the original bill and the Senate amendments may be now reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for the expenses of certain special committees.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $21,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the three special committees charged, respectively, with the investigation of the recent elections in the States of Louisiana, of South Carolina, and of Florida; said appropriation to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the chairmen of the respective committees.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Insert after the word "committees," in line 7, the words "from the House of Representatives;" so as to read: "To defray the expenses of the three special committees from the House of Representatives," &c.

At the end of the bill, add the following as an additional section:

"SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in making the investigations directed by Senate resolution of December 5, 1876, in the several States named therein, said appropriation to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate. And the disbursing officer of the Senate shall advance such parts of the sum above appropriated to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate as the chairman of said committee shall, in writing, direct, for the purpose aforesaid; and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall, as soon as practicable, make a detailed report of the expenditure thereof, with proper vouchers, which, when so made, shall be received by said disbursing officer and returned with his accounts to the proper officer of the Treasury Department."

Amend the title so as to read:

"An act to provide for the expenses of certain special committees of the House of Representatives and of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. A word of explanation: The House provided for the appointment of three committees, and finally of four: a committee of fifteen to make investigation into the recent election in the State of Louisiana, a committee of nine to make investigation into the recent election in the State of South Carolina, and a committee of six to make investigation into the recent election in the State of Florida; subsequently a committee of five was appointed to investigate the recent election and examine into the question of alleged fraud in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Philadelphia. The appropriation for the first three committees was fixed by the House at $21,000, which was believed to be quite an ample sum for that purpose. The Senate provided for enlarging the committee known in that body as the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and provided for three subcommittees, of three members each, to visit South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, to make corresponding investigation, with the power, as the Committee on Appropriations understands, on the part of that portion of the committee which remains at the Capitol to make investigations generally into the recent elections, embracing perhaps the State of Mississippi, and all matters concerning the election.

The Senate propose an appropriation of $50,000 to carry out the purposes of the resolution of that body.

On examination by the Committee on Appropriations, it is deemed entirely proper that the appropriation should be about the same sum that the House Committee on Appropriations recommended, and therefore they recommend an increase of the appropriation for the House committees, in view of the enlargement of the committees to four instead of three, from $21,000 to $30,000, in view of the organization of an additional committee, and the appropriation of a corresponding sum of $30,000 to meet the expenses of the committees appointed on the part of the Senate.

The more common practice has been, perhaps it may be said, (although I think there is no common practice upon the subject,) for each House to appropriate the sum which it deems necessary for making an investigation authorized by them. That, however, cannot be regarded as a settled practice by any means, but both Houses must concur as to what are reasonable and proper expenses for any given purpose.

The tendency of late years has been to render our investigations exceedingly expensive, and the expenses of such investigations have grown rapidly in late years. It is believed by the Committee on Appropriations that the sum of $30,000 for each of the two Houses will meet every necessary expenditure growing out of these investigations that may be made. The law is that the members of the two branches of Congress, acting upon investigating committees, shall be paid simply their absolute expenses incurred; nothing beyond that.

It is not intended that a member serving upon a committee of investigation shall receive increased compensation, but that he shall receive only his actual current expenses. This, with the expenses of subpœnaing witnesses and of clerks and stenographers, is covered by this appropriation.

One other word. I notice that in the haste of preparing this amendment the limitation of this appropriation to the actual expenses only applies to the last section of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the same terms shall be applied to the first section of the bill; that the money shall be applied only to the actual and necessary expenses of these committees, and nothing more.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to retain the floor upon this bill, but I yield to the gentleman from Maine for a moment.

Mr. HALE. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of opposing the reduction recommended in the report of the Committee on Appropriations as affecting the cost of the Senate investigation, which has been cut down from $50,000 to $30,000, and I do it for this reason: The Senate, in the exercise of its undoubted right, has determined to investigate these matters in certain Southern States, upon which the House at first started.

Instead of appointing new committees of the Senate, as we have done, that body has increased one of its committees—the Committee on Privileges and Elections—to fifteen members, and the committee has subdivided and has sent branch committees into three Southern States.

It has in addition to that appointed another large subcommittee that proposes to sit here in Washington and to summon witnesses from certain other States. I learn that witnesses have already been summoned from Oregon, and I understand it is the purpose of the committee to send for a large number of witnesses from Mississippi. Every gentleman will see that this method adopted by the Senate, in the exercise of its discretion, is an expensive method. But the Senate has determined upon this method; it has decided that it will so examine and so investigate. Gentlemen in certain States, upon both sides of the House, have been requested to give lists of witnesses from their respective States to be summoned by the committee. And the Senate has said that it believed that $50,000 will not be too much for the carrying out of this plan.

Now upon a question of this kind I do not believe that my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who is an honest economist and wants to save the public money where he can, should insist upon his parsimonious rule. There are some things that are more important to the American people than the expenditure of $20,000, the difference between the amount named by the Senate, and the amount named in the report submitted to this House from the Committee on Appropriations.

This is a subject-matter upon which the American people have intently fixed their minds. The Senate has determined to investigate this subject. The difference of $20,000 may hamper that investigation if denied, or if given may make it free, full, and fair. I do not believe the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] wants that there should be any pinch upon the committees.

I had occasion not long ago to visit one of these States. I am not going into its condition except very briefly, in order to illustrate my argument in favor of appropriating the sum asked by the Senate. I found there a condition of things that should be investigated. I found that large portions of the State had been patrolled by armed bodies of men who intimidated, as I believe, a defenseless people undertaking to exercise their right of suffrage. By reading certain reports emanating from authoritative sources on the other side, I find that it is denied that this condition of things arose from any political considerations or circumstances. Now, we can afford to give $20,000 to find out whether that is true or not true.

There is to-day in South Carolina a condition of things that attracts the attention of the American people. There are double Legislatures and double governors there; two men have been inaugurated as governor and claim to control all the power of that State. There is also a contest as to the electoral certificate, as to who had the right to cast the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina. The people of this country would be glad to give $20,000 to have that question more fully investigated.

One word more only, as I know the gentleman from Indiana wants to get through with this matter, and that is this: Knowing something of the situation in one of these States, I bid that gentleman and his party Godspeed in the effort to investigate everything by and large. The truth is mighty and will prevail in this matter. I wish a fair committee could be sent to Louisiana (for I know more of that State than of any other) every other day if necessary, in order that the truth may be got at. I do not care how the committee is constituted; I do not care if two-thirds of all these committees that visit these States to probe their wounds and wrongs and bring them to light, are made up from the other side. I know that any committee going down there and investigating will find at the bottom a condition of affairs that will attract and absorb the attention of the American people.

That is why I want to appropriate the largest sum named. If necessary I would double the appropriation for the use of committees; I would have no hinderance put upon any of them, but would let them go down there and visit every parish and take full testimony and report to this House. I venture to say that no voice on this side of the House will be raised against giving them ample money.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not propose to enter into——

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a privileged motion, a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is now on the floor.

Mr. MILLS. Under the rule I have a right to take a member from the floor for the purpose of entering a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House on yesterday referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs the message of the President, with accompanying documents, upon the subject of the negotiation pending for the removal of the Sioux Indians to the Indian Territory.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered upon the Journal.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not suppose that a bill proposing simply to appropriate money to aid in a legitimate and proper investigation by the two Houses would give rise to a discussion of the merits of the controversy out of which these committees have grown. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] must see that the merits of this controversy do not come up at all——

Mr. HALE. I did not attempt to go into them.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman should remember further that members upon this side of the House have shown at least as much anxiety for a full and fair inquiry into the events of the late elections in the States named as the gentleman and his friends have done. On the contrary I think my usually fair and frank friend is just at this moment acting upon a principle which has not hitherto controlled his action in this House. If I am not mistaken, my friend very earnestly opposed the organization of committees to visit these States to the South to inquire into the question of the regularity and peacefulness of the elections lately held there.

Mr. HALE. Let me correct the gentleman. I was then on my way from Louisiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is right.

Mr. HALE. Had I been here, I would have joined heartly in the appointment of every committee sought to be sent down there; for I have been there.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very glad to hear that statement. But the gentleman's political friends opposed the appointment of those committees with great earnestness, there being I believe but three exceptions on that side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Four.

Mr. HOLMAN. With but few exceptions the gentlemen on the other side opposed the investigation. Now the gentleman from Maine shall not go farther than I will in favor of full and fair investigation into the events connected with the recent election in any of the States of the South or of the North. I think it is a matter of such high importance that while there should be positive economy in all the expenditures of this Government, the sum really required for this purpose, even if it should prove to be a large sum, should be cheerfully appropriated rather than that the investigation should not be full and complete.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that probably the amount fixed here for the House committee will not be, when all the expenses are in, nearly large enough. The appropriation must cover the expenses of members, of witnesses, of marshals, of stenographers, of rooms, and a thousand and one other expenditures attendant upon the work of a great committee. Does not my friend think that if the appropriation goes through at this limited amount we shall be obliged hereafter to add to it?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, I think not. I have known a committee of this House, consisting of seven members, and employed during the vacation of Congress as well as during its sessions for a period of two years, sitting in almost all the principal cities of this Union embraced within the then lines of loyal territory; and yet the expenditure was only one-fourth the amount we are appropriating for any one of these committees.

Mr. HALE. That was under the stringent administration of the former member from Illinois, Mr. Washburne, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; and all I ask is that such stringent administration shall be restored in regard to these expenditures.

I have observed with some degree of indignation (as I think my friend from Maine has) the extravagance of the Houses of Congress, not only in the organization of committees to be sent abroad, but in the growing expenditures for such purposes. I must say that in my judgment $30,000 appropriated to the committees of each House is very ample. I hope the gentleman from Maine will bear in mind strictly this fact, that the House, with a larger number of members and with the same number of committees, is proposing to appropriate only the same amount for the use of its committees that it concedes to the Senate. The gentleman must bear in mind another fact, that the House is at least as much responsible as the Senate, if not more so, for the proper and economical expenditure of the public money.

Mr. HALE. I grant that.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the House cannot consent to appropriate any more than is absolutely required.

Mr. HALE. Let me call the gentleman's attention upon this point to the distinction to which he first alluded, that the House does not propose that either of its committees shall sit here and summon witnesses from far distant States. That is the most expensive method of conducting an examination, and the Senate does that.

Mr. HOLMAN. And does my friend think that it is the duty of this House out of courtesy (very high courtesy indeed it would be) to permit another branch of the Government, no more responsible for the public expenditures than we are, to adopt the most expensive mode of investigation when a more economical mode could be adopted?

Mr. HALE. Suppose it is done, can we really on a subject of this importance cavil with the Senate upon the sum of $20,000?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that we make ample appropriations.

Mr. HALE. I fear not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for a moment to my friend from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Inasmuch as we are about appropriating money for these committees, I desire to say that so far as concerns the committee appointed to investigate alleged frauds in New York, Jersey City, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia, this side of the House is not exactly responsible for any expenditure that may ensue. A resolution contemplati g such investigation came from my distinguished colleague [Mr. MACDOUGALL] on the other side. I do not know whether he expected it to pass or not. This side of the House, however, gave it considerable welcome; and inasmuch as his resolution implied a reproach upon the voters of the city I in part represent and the circumjacent cities, I thought it nothing more than politic, wise, and fair that we should not be accused of alleged unexamined frauds where we have had abundant victories, and thus divert attention and denunciation from the three Southern States where examinations are going on. By refusing a fair examination in northern elections we might subject ourselves to odium from the ignorant and unthinking.

I venture to say that so far as New York is concerned there was no special need of this committee or this investigation. I can say the same for Jersey City; I think I may say the same for Brooklyn. So far as I have heard no United States officer in either of those three cities has impugned the correctness and integrity of the elections there. But the imputation being made by gentlemen on the other side, we felt bound to make this examination with a view to that proper emphasis which belongs to our position in other respects and in other States.

I may say here, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, that when Philadelphia was inserted in that resolution it was inserted at your own special instance. And if, as has been said, the resolution was directed at the fairness of the election to Congress of the present Speaker, he has welcomed any investigation from the city of Philadelphia as we do from the other cities farther north.

Now in response to what fell from the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] He is so anxious now for investigation! I wish he had been here to have assisted his friends to a wiser judgment on the first days of the session. And why not now? Cannot he, a leader on that side of the House, call on his friends here to our help, to aid us in Louisiana? Can he not help us to an answer of the questions involved in the electoral vote of Louisiana? Can he not persuade, or in some way aid us to procure the records demanded by the congressional committee, and so contumaciously withheld?

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. COX. Why does your Governor Wells refuse to give fair, prompt, and honest answer, that the Congress of the United States may know how best to solve this great trouble?

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman let me answer for one moment?

Mr. COX. That they may know without concealment and without fraud.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. I always yield.

Mr. HALE. I will tell you. I do not understand that Governor Wells has declined in any instance to furnish certified copies of every paper and document and iota of testimony.

Mr. COX. That will do. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Every iota that went before his board.

Mr. COX. That will do. I know they furnish certified copies, but who would believe their certified copies. [Laughter.] We know as we know that God lives, that the originals are the places where fraud and forgery are to be found.

Mr. HALE. And every item of original documents has been submitted to the committee upon the other side and the committee upon this side, from the opening of the investigation—every document.

Mr. COX. We want the originals. O, the pretext is that they must report first to the Legislature of Louisiana!

Mr. BLAND. We do not know what the board did when it went into secret session.

Mr. COX. The investigation is in reference to the election of electors upon which the Presidency of the United States depends. It is a question going all through this country, giving it anxiety and solicitude without example or precedent. Yet in this perilous time your model board defers to their own bogus Legislature and not to the American Congress. I am ashamed that that side of the House does not at once rise up and instruct their pet, Governor Wells, to respond to the demand of our committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Being ashamed is mutual. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. My colleague from New York who always breaks in out of order [laughter] has just made a confession before this people. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. And confession is good for the soul.

Mr. COX. I am glad of it. It is good for the soul. He acknowledges that the shame is on the other side of the House. We do not acknowledge any shame on this side.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You are incapable of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Now you just sit down for one moment. [Laughter.] He said that the shame was mutual. I suppose he meant it was mutual between the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] [Laughter.] We have no cause for shame. We have no shame.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is so.

Mr. COX. And I will give you the reason for it. It is because we have no foundation upon which to build up any shame. Perhaps the little quip of the gentleman will lose some of its sense, and all of its wit and logic when understood. Why, sir, should we be ashamed? Your board sat in secret session.

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. COX. To hide is a thing most shameful!

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. COX. The two last days your board sat in secret session.

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. COX. Not the two last days?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and the gentleman from Maine is not in order.

Mr. HALE. The Chair must pardon me, as the gentleman said he would yield at any time for correction.

Mr. COX. Why did you not put a democrat on the board? Were you ashamed to be seen by a democrat when you were in secret session?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman want an answer to that?

Mr. COX. Yes; I want you to answer that?

Mr. HALE. And I will not take long in answering it. The returning board as originally constituted——

Mr. COX. O, no; I do not want you to go back so far. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I will not. I wish to answer the gentleman, as he gives me leave, and when I get through he will say I have stuck to the text.

Mr. COX. Answer the question, yes or no. Did not they sit the last two days in secret session?

Mr. HALE. They did not. The board examined the papers in open session, and then retired for deliberation as judges; there was no business session of the board in secret. Now, as to the question as to why they did not appoint a democrat——

Mr. COX. That will do.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman asked me why they did not appoint a democrat. Does he decline to allow me to answer his question?

Mr. COX. I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps I will get the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana later to answer this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not much time left.

Mr. HALE. The House will grant the time, I am sure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is not in order. The gentleman from New York declines to be interrupted.

Mr. COX. I will not dispute with my friend from Maine as to the fact whether or not they sat the last two days in secret. But he just now confesses that as judges they were sitting in secret and consulting. Consulting about what? What were they doing? That is just what our committee and the people want to know.

Mr. HALE. They were making up their conclusions.

Mr. COX. O, yes! I have here in my hand a statement signed by gentlemen of probity, Governor Palmer, Ex-Senator Trumbull, Governor Bigler, George B. Smith of Wisconsin, Mr. George W. Julian, (whom we all know as a man of perfect integrity,) and Mr. P. H. Watson, formerly Assistant Secretary of War. All these men were there on the ground and they confirm my statement that there were secret sessions. And why do not the committee have full information in respect to such sessions? Why does not the gentleman instruct his compatriots down there to give us that full investigation which he now professes to so much desire? There never was a more momentous time than the present. The people require a thorough, searching investigation. No secrecy can be allowed. What is the object of your prescript, Mr. Speaker, calling for witnesses, calling for records? What is the object of the duces tecum which you have the power to issue for the committee? What is the object of this investigation? Is it simply to skim over the surface? Is it to get such copies as the board chooses to give? No, sir. It is to go below the surface. Our jurisdiction is below the mere shell. We want to know what is under, covered, hid. The question is whether a certificate is good when we get behind the prima facie.

I trust, sir, that I am not mistaken in saying that the time will come when that side of the House in accord with the Senate will demand that we shall go below all these superficial paper certifications, and get at the truth as it stood in those parishes of Louisiana and elsewhere, to the end that the legally expressed will of the people shall appear. Thus, and thus only, Mr. Speaker, can this vexed and great question of the Presidency be settled. Thus, and thus only, can come content and peace to our beloved country.

After the discussion which has been had here to-day, I welcome with all sincerity and good faith the efforts of my friend from Maine to make this investigation thorough. Let him take no step backward; and to him shall be the honor that belongs to an honest gentleman and a devoted patriot.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to have this paper printed as a part of my remarks.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. For how long?

Mr. HALE. For ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can only yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the paper sent up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] being printed unless it is read.

Mr. COX. Very well; let it be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is left of the hour to which I am entitled?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this debate has been running by unanimous consent, subject, however, to the control of the floor by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to call the previous question whenever he desires.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to the debate proceeding further unless this side of the House has an opportunity to participate.

The SPEAKER. The debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. This bill is regularly before the House, and the debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair did not ask unanimous consent to bring the bill before the House. He said the bill would be read and the Chair would then ask for objections, if any.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will allow the Chair to remind him that this is a report from the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was recognized by the Chair to make a report from that committee.

Mr. CONGER. But this is not one of the regular appropriation bills, which the committee is authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. No one objected to the report being made, and the bill is therefore before the House.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair said he would have the bill read, and then he would ask for objections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to this ruling in the Digest:

After a question has been stated and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I was misled, then, by the Chair proposing to ask the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the gentleman was misled by the Chair; he was misled by himself.

Mr. CONGER. I think I know my own motives better than the Chair does; but I was waiting for the Chair to ask for objections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not question anybody's motives.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that this debate is running under the hour rule?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And that when the gentleman from Indiana has occupied the floor for one hour he cannot hold it longer?

The SPEAKER. He can only hold it for one hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Chair holds that from the commencement of this debate the hour began, I will be glad to know how much time has already been consumed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as nearly as he can ascertain, thinks that there is about twenty-five minutes of the hour left.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading may continue, so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the reading should not proceed so as to cut off the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to do that at all. I trust that inasmuch as the discussion has proceeded by unanimous consent, and without objection, that from the time the gentleman called for the regular order the hour began. I think that will be a fair interpretation of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is reminded by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and also by the gentleman from Iowa, that he must determine under the rule that there is but one hour of debate remaining and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the remaining time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust, then, by unanimous consent, that the debate will be prolonged, so that there will be half an hour in addition to the usual hour for debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. How much of that time will this side of the House get?

Mr. HALE. Let this side of the House get half of the extension of time, and let the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the rule shall not be enforced to cut off the debate at the end of one hour, but that the debate shall continue for an additional half hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Can we have half of that time? I do not want it for myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that each side be allowed fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will now ask that the reading be continued, and I trust that before it is concluded the House will be able to come to a satisfactory conclusion.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the paper.

Mr. CONGER. [interrupting.] At the request of my friends upon this side of the House I will withdraw the demand for the reading of the paper.

Mr. HILLIKEN and Mr. BANNING insisted on the continuation of the reading.

The Clerk again proceeded with the reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of electoral messengers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the President's message with the accompanying documents in relation to the election in Louisiana.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COX. If there is no objection upon the other side of the House, I will ask that this paper be printed so as to afford the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] an opportunity to peruse it.

Mr. CONGER. I think it had better be read; it is very interesting reading.

Mr. HALE. I hope my friend from Michigan will not insist upon that.

Mr. CONGER. The gentlemen opposite refuse to indicate that we should have any portion of time allowed for this debate, and I would rather hear this paper read than hear their speeches.

Mr. COX. Well, let it be read.

The Clerk resumed reading the paper, which is as follows:

To the people of the United States:

The returning board of Louisiana having this day promulgated, as the result of the recent election in that State, that the Hayes and Wheeler candidates for electors received a majority of the votes, we, who by invitation watched the proceedings of the board in opening and canvassing the returns till it went into secret session, deem it our duty to lay before you and the public such facts connected with the election and the returns as will, we think, clearly show that the action of the returning board in proclaiming the election of the Hayes electors is arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law, and we adopt as applicable to this canvass the language of a report made to the United States House of Representatives in 1875 by GEORGE F. HOAR, W. A. WHEELER, and WILLIAM P. FRYE, in regard to the canvass of 1872, in which they say:

"The so-called canvass made by the returning board in the interest of Kellogg seems to us to have no validity, and is entitled to no respect whatever." We also adopt the language of this same report upon the condition of Louisiana in 1875: "In the State of Louisiana there is a governor in office who owes his seat to the interference of the national power, which has recognized his title to his office, not by reason of any ascertainment of the facts by legal process, but has based its action solely on the illegal order of a judge."

"In the same State there is a Legislature, one branch of which derives its authority partly from the same order, the other being organized by a majority who have been established in power by another interference of the National Government, and which majority derives its title, not from any legal ascertainment of the facts, but from the certificates of a returning board which has misconceived and exceeded its legal authority."

November 18, 1876, before the returning board commenced the canvass of the electoral vote, the candidates for electors on the democratic ticket presented a protest against its jurisdiction over the subject or its canvass of the votes relating to the same. This protest was summarily overruled by the board, without affording an opportunity for argument. No legal proposition, in our opinion, is clearer than that the board was mistaken as to its powers, and that it had nothing whatever to do with the electoral vote. The Constitution of the United States declares:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress, but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector."

The Legislature of Louisiana has either directed the manner in which the electors shall be appointed or it has not. The election law of 1872 and amendments, under which the returning board is created and acts, makes no provision as to the manner of appointing electors of President and Vice-President, whether by the Legislature or by a vote of the people, nor whether by the State at large or by congressional districts, nor does it contain any provisions as to the qualification of electors, the place where they are to meet, nor for filling vacancies. Section 71 of that act declares as follows: "That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed." This is not an implied, but a direct repeal of all prior election laws to which it refers, and if it repeals the previous act of 1868, revised in 1870, providing for the appointment of presidential electors, it repeals the whole of it and all its provisions, and there is no law of the State on that subject, and of course the board would have no jurisdiction to canvass votes cast for such officers. If, on the other hand, the act of 1872 does not repeal the law of 1870, then presidential electors must be appointed, and the canvass of the votes therefor must be made in accordance with the law of 1870, and the returning board has no jurisdiction over the subject, as will be seen by reference to some of the provisions of the act of 1870, which are as follows:

"SEC. 2824. Every qualified voter in the State shall vote for electors as follows: Two persons shall be selected from the State at large and one person shall be chosen from each congressional district in this State; and in case any ticket shall contain two or more names of persons residing in the same district, (except the two chosen from the State at large,) the first of such names only shall be considered as duly voted for.

"SEC. 2825. No person shall be considered a qualified elector who is not a qualified voter in the district for which he is chosen, or, in case of being selected for the State at large, then of some parish of the State.

"SEC. 2826. Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors."

"SEC. 2829. The electors shall meet at the seat of government on the day appointed for their meeting by the act of Congress, the first Wednesday in December, and shall then and there proceed to execute the duties and services enjoined upon them by the Constitution of the United States, in the manner therein prescribed."

"SEC. 2830. If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place at the hour (four p. m.) of the day prescribed for their meeting it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to fill such vacancy or vacancies."

It is immaterial, so far as affects the jurisdiction of the returning board, whether the act of 1870 relating to the appointment of presidential electors is repealed or not. If repealed, there is no law in Louisiana for the appointment of presidential electors; if not repealed, then the canvass of the returns cast for such electors must be made by the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, as required by the act of 1870, and in making such canvass they would be confined to an ascertainment of the persons elected, according to the returns, without authority to reject votes. In no event can the returning board have jurisdiction of the returns of electors of President and Vice-President, and their canvass of the same is therefore a nullity, and entitled to no respect from any one. In another aspect it may be important to determine whether the act of 1872 is repealed, for, if it is, the statutes of the State provide no mode of filling vacancies in the electoral college, and it is understood that two of the electoral candidates on the republican ticket held offices of trust or profit under the United States at the time of the election, and could not therefore be appointed electors.

Other objections were made to the jurisdiction of the returning board: that it was anti-republican; that it was in conflict with the constitution of the State, in that it undertook to exercise judicial functions and in that with only four members it was not legally constituted.

The election law declares: "That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers."

The present board consists of only four members, to wit: J. Madison Wells, T. C. Anderson, G. Casanave, and Louis M. Kenner, one of whom, T. C. Anderson, was a candidate for the State senate at the recent election on the republican ticket. All are members of the republican party. They are the same persons who constituted the returning board in 1874 and canvassed the election returns of that year, and of whom a committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, composed of Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, FRYE, FOSTER, Phelps, Marshall, and Potter, after careful investigation of its action, said: "We are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal."

The vacancy in the board, occasioned by the resignation of Oscar Arroyo, in December, 1874, has never been filled, although repeated applications by the representatives of the democratic-conservative party of the State and its candidates have been made to the board to fill the same. The foregoing committee of the House of Representatives, commenting on the failure of the board to fill the vacancy in 1874, when it occurred, said: "Your committee think the law as to the constitution of the board was not complied with." If this view be correct the board is not so constituted as to have authority to act at all.

The entire clerical force appointed by the board at its present session to compile the votes cast is also republican, and the board refused an application to appoint any clerk or to allow any person of the opposite party to be present to witness the compilation, and even excluded the United States supervisors of election under the act of Congress.

The laws of Louisiana require a registration of voters every two years by officers appointed by the governor of the State; the registration to commence the last Monday of August preceding the general election in November. The election law of the State contains the following provisions for conducting the election, making returns, &c., to wit:

"SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or supervisor of registration he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish; if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act which he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of election by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney."

"SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election at each poll or voting place to keep a list of the names of the persons voting at such poll or voting-place, which list shall be numbered from one to the end; and said list of voters, with their names and numbers as aforesaid, shall be signed and sworn to as correct by the commissioners immediately on closing of the polls, and before leaving the place, and before opening the box. If no judge or justice of the peace or other person authorized to administer such oath be present to do so, it may be administered by any voter. The votes shall be counted by the commissioners at each voting-place immediately after closing the election and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. Tally lists shall be kept of the count; and after the count the ballots counted shall be put back into the box and preserved until after the next term of the criminal or district court, as the case may be; and in the parishes, except Orleans, the commissioners of election, or any one of them selected for that purpose, shall carry the box and deliver it to the clerk of the district court, who shall preserve the same as above required; and in the parish of Orleans the box shall be delivered to the clerk of the first district court for the parish of Orleans, and be kept by him as above directed."

"SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of said commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally lists used in making the count and statement of the votes."

Section 2 declares that, "Within ten days after the closing of the election, said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall at such meeting open, in the presence of the said returning officers, the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the elections thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after a contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned."

"SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election."

Under section 2 of the foregoing provisions, it will be seen that the duty of the board of returning officers is similar to that of State canvassing boards in most of the other States of the Union—simply "to canvass and compile the statements of the commissioners of election," and proclaim the result; and this is the whole duty of the returning board, unless the commissioners of election, or the supervisor of some parish, impose upon it a further duty, as provided in sections 26 and 43. In commenting upon the powers of the returning board, we avail ourselves of the able argument of Judge Spofford made before it.

No one has the right to attack the returns from any poll, ward, or parish in the State on account of undue influence, intimidation, or other acts of violence, unless the foundation therefor be first laid by the statement of the commissioners of election at the particular poll, if the acts occurred on election day, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occurred during registration, as provided in sections 26 and 43. The board has no legal authority to receive or give effect to statements of outside parties till the proper commissioners of election and supervisor have spoken.

Nor has the board been invested with the power to institute complaints against any poll ex officio or of its own motion. It cannot blot out or fail to count a solitary vote returned unless a legal foundation has been laid for inquiry by the supervisor of the parish where the vote was cast, or by one of the commissioners of election reporting through such supervisor; and even they (the supervisor and commissioners) can only lay a foundation for inquiry in the board by making and forwarding in the prescribed manner their official "statements" contemporaneously with their returns, and in the very form set forth by section 26 of the act in question. Challenging the votes of whole cities and parishes by unofficial persons, even though they are candidates, is a startling and lawless innovation.

No outside protest can be entertained, because even a supervisor's "statement" can receive no consideration by the board, but must be wholly disregarded, unless made at a time and in a manner which no outside party could possibly comply with. His "statement," or that of his subordinate commissioner, must form an integral part of his return and official report; it cannot be made up at a different time and place from the return to which the law requires it to be attached "by paste, wax, or some other adhesive substance," and a duplicate thereto must be lodged by him with the clerk of the court of his parish. It must be made under oath. It must be "a clear and full statement of all the facts and of the effect produced thereby."

Such a statement, so annexed and sent by mail, is the only kind of statement the board can notice at all so as to institute an inquiry into intimidation, &c. The intent of the law is plain and indisputable, that all the supervisors should be engaged simultaneously in their several parishes in completing their returns and statements on the spot where the election was held, without communication with each other or with persons beyond the parish, and before they can obtain information of what has been done in other parishes or of the general result.

And the reason for these minute, mandatory, and imperative provisions is equally obvious. It was precisely to shut out from consideration by the returning board all such ex post facto complaints as have been trumped up and illegally thrust in here at the last moment by Mr. Kellogg, Mr. Packard, Mr. Brewster, and even by some of the supervisors themselves. The law has not been complied with. Most of the supervisors who have put in complaints have not written them at the proper time and in the proper parish; they have not annexed them to their returns, sealed and sent them by mail. They have brought down their returns to this city with no statement so annexed, but have patched up statements here at an improper time and in an improper place. They could only fulfill duties according to law by finishing their returns, attached statements and all, and mailing them, sealed up in one envelope, at one of their parish post-offices, within the time required by law.

It is appalling to think that statements thus made contrary to law, after the result of the election through the State was known with approximate accuracy, made as an after-thought by disappointed candidates and their friends, with an evident view to cast a drag-net of suspicion over parishes enough to reverse the emphatic verdict of the people, made, too, at so late a day, and so great a distance from many of the parishes struck at, that it is impossible to have any fair investigation, should receive consideration.

Commenting upon the foregoing provision of the Louisiana statute, Messrs. GEORGE F. HOAR, W. A. WHEELER, and W. P. FRYE, in their report, made February 4, 1875, said:

"Upon this statute we are all clearly of opinion that the returning board has no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificates of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption, on a hearing or the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board, of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the right of persons claiming to be elected."

* * * * *

"There is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law, to redress or prevent what they deem public wrongs."

These references to the report of the congressional committee upon the action of this same returning board in 1874, and its construction of the statute, are made that the public may know how this board and its rulings were regarded by prominent gentlemen, one of them a candidate for Vice President at the recent election, at a time when its decision did not affect a presidential election.

We regard it as indisputable that the returning board has no jurisdiction to inquire into and reject the returns from any voting place in the State on account of intimidation, acts of violence, or other causes mentioned in the statute, unless the foundation for such inquiry and rejection is laid at the time and in the manner provided by the statute.

In no case did the supervisor of registration deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish, as required by section 26, a duplicate statement, made and sworn to by the commissioners of election and corroborated by three citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, and of the facts relating thereto occurring on the day of election, nor any like statement of his own that any such acts occurred during the time of registration or the revision of registration. When the returns were opened by the returning board such statements were found among the papers in a few instances, but not in relation to the parishes of either Ouachita, Morehouse, East Baton Rouge, East or West Feliciana, and such were the manifest efforts on the part of the officers of election to conceal their acts and confuse and mislead persons interested in a proper investigation of the facts relating to the election that it was impossible to determine whether any such statements had been made by the commissioners of election or the supervisor of registration and attached to the returns of the supervisor in any parish in the State at the time and in the manner required by sections 26 and 43.

This fact leaves the returning board without jurisdiction to inquire into acts of violence, &c., at the election or during registration, and with no other duty to perform except to canvass and compile the votes returned, as the returning officers of any other State would do; and as the returns opened by them show a majority for the Tilden electors, it ought to be an end of all controversy on the subject. But as the board, in the face of these facts, has come to the extraordinary conclusion to declare that the Hayes electors have a majority, it is proper to look further into its action.

The first meeting of the board attended by us was held November 20, at which an application in behalf of the candidates on the democratic-conservative ticket that all the proceedings of the board should be public, and that interested candidates should have leave to be present, by themselves or counsel, at the opening of the returns, with the right to inspect the same, was refused, and certain rules were adopted, against several of which protests were filed, and particularly against rule 9, which declared that:

"9. No ex parte affidavits or statements shall be received in evidence except as a basis to show that such fraud, intimidation, or other illegal practice had at some poll requires investigation; but the returns and affidavits authorized by law, made by officers of election or in verification of statements as required by law, shall be received in evidence as prima facie."

Under this rule several hundred ex parte affidavits were prepared and sworn to in New Orleans charging intimidation and other illegal acts in distant parishes, were then put into the envelopes inclosing the supervisor's consolidated returns, which had been brought to the city of New Orleans and kept open for the purpose. This was done to support statements of intimidation or other illegal acts interpolated by supervisors, long after their consolidated returns had been made out and sworn to as correct and been filed with the proper district clerk without any protests or allegation of intimidation or other acts of violence.

The proceedings of the board in executive session, to which we were admitted, consisted in opening the returns from each parish and examining the votes for presidential electors. If no protest or objection appeared among the papers and there was no outside protest from any one, the returns were sent to a private room to be tabulated by the clerks, all of whom were republicans, who kept their action secret. If any protest was found among the papers or from outside parties, the returns were laid aside, to be afterward considered by the board in secret. In the few cases in which there were charges of fraud, intimidation, or other illegal acts, the candidates or their attorneys were permitted to take copies of the charges, and testimony taken on written interrogatories was submitted in regard to such parishes.

December 2, after all the returns had been opened, the board went into secret session, and we were not permitted to see the compilation of returns already made, nor to know what rules the board adopted in passing upon contested cases, nor the processes by which it arrived at results.

We have been furnished a triplicate, or a certified copy of the duplicate statement of the commissioners of election at each voting-place in the State, from which has been compiled a consolidated statement of the entire vote of the State for presidential electors.

From this statement, which we believe to be accurate, the majority for the highest Tilden elector over the lowest Hayes elector is 8,957, and the majority for the lowest Tilden elector over the highest Hayes elector is 6,300.

The returns in our possession correspond precisely in most cases with those opened by the returning board. The difference in the aggregate arises mainly from the fact that the board did not have all the returns before it. The supervisors, all of whom were republicans, many of them employés in the custom-house in New Orleans, some non-residents of the State, and one of them under indictment for murder, withheld the statements of the commissioners of election in some instances where democratic majorities were given, amounting in the aggregate to about 1,500 votes. The returning board refused to receive certified copies of the duplicates of these missing returns filed in the offices of the secretary of state and the clerks of the district courts, or to take any effective measures to procure the originals.

The returning board, in proclaiming the result of the vote for electors, makes no statement of the votes cast in the several parishes, but simply announces the aggregate vote for each elector in the State, giving the Hayes electors majorities varying from 4,626 to 4,712.

To accomplish which they disfranchised 13,350 democratic and 2,042 republican voters. This announcement is made in the face of the fact that the statements made by the commissioners of election showed a majority ranging from 6,300 to 8,957 for the Tilden electors. No attempt is made to give a reason for this arbitrary action of the board, nor is there any statement to show what votes were counted and what rejected. As well might the officers canvassing the returns of the election for presidential electors in Ohio or Massachusetts declare the Tilden electors in those States elected, in the face of the fact that the returns showed a majority for the Hayes electors. We have shown that it is questionable whether the Legislature of Louisiana has made provision for the appointment of electors at all; that, if it has made such provision, it has not vested the returning board with authority to canvass the returns of the votes cast for such officers; and that if it were possible to construe the statute as conferring such authority on the returning board, then the same statute limits the authority of the board to the canvass and compilation of "the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election," without authority to reject any on account of intimidation or other acts of violence, unless the foundation therefor be first laid as provided in the statute; and the evidence does not disclose that such foundation was laid in any instance. There is, however, evidence of attempts surreptitiously to lay such foundation after the consolidated returns were completed, and that the supervisors of election in many instances unlawfully withheld their returns for that purpose and interpolated among them ex parte affidavits, taken in secret in New Orleans, before a United States commissioner, which the board has no jurisdiction to consider.

The evidence taken on both sides, so far as it has been accessible to us, discloses a state of lawlessness in certain parishes not in the State generally, about the cause of which parties are not agreed. The democrats attribute it to the inefficiency and imbecility of the State government, which they allege to be a usurpation, resting wholly for support on the Federal Army, without the confidence or respect of the people, and without the disposition to prevent or punish crime which they can pervert to political uses. Such a state of things, as might be expected, has led to disorder, and, in some instances, to the most shocking barbarities.

The republicans, on the other hand, attribute the lawlessness to the hostility of the white against the colored race, and as largely due to politics.

The murders and outrages which have been brought to our notice are frequently committed by persons of the same race upon each other, and in a large majority of cases have no political significance.

Many such cases were brought to the notice of the board by ex parte affidavits, without regard to the time of their occurrence, and when they did not have the slightest connection with the recent election. Strangely enough, it is assumed by the republicans, who have had complete control of the State government for years, that if they could show that lawlessness prevailed in certain localities, and crime went unpunished that those facts furnished a reason why they should be continued in power, notwithstanding the large majority of ballots cast against them.

Another assumption of the republicans is that all the colored men in the State are necessarily republicans. This is by no means true. We were visited by a large number of colored persons from different parts of the State, including the alleged disturbed districts, who made speeches and took an active part in the canvass in favor of the democratic ticket, and who gave, among other reasons for so doing, that they had been deceived by republican officials, who had proved dishonest and corrupt, had robbed them of their school-money, and burdened them with unnecessary taxes, and that they believed it for the interest of the colored race to unite their fortunes with the whites, whose interests, like their own, were identified with the State.

It is certain that thousands of colored persons voluntarily and actively supported the democratic ticket. The entire vote of the State at the recent election is about fifteen thousand greater than ever before; and even in the parishes where intimidation is charged it exceeds, in the aggregate, any previous vote. The congressional committee, which, it is understood, will soon visit the State, armed with authority to send for persons and papers, and inquire into all the facts connected with the recent election and the action of the returning board, will have greater facilities for arriving at the truth than we possess; but with the law and such facts before us as have been disclosed by the action of the returning board, we do not hesitate to declare that its proceedings as witnessed by us were partial and unfair, and that the result it has announced is arbitrary, illegal, and entitled to no respect whatever.

Fifteen years ago, when Fort Sumter was fired upon by men who sought a disruption of the Union, a million patriots, without regard to party affiliations, sprang to its defense. Will the same patriotic citizens now sit idly by and see representative government overthrown by usurpation and fraud? Shall the will of forty millions of people, constitutionally expressed, be thwarted by the corrupt, arbitrary, and illegal action of an illegally constituted returning board in Louisiana, whose wrongful action heretofore, in all respects similar to its present action, has been condemned by all parties? It is an admitted fact that Mr. Tilden received a majority of a quarter of a million of the votes at the recent election. This majority is ready and willing to submit to the rule of the minority when constitutionally entitled to demand such submission, but is it willing that by an arbitrary and false declaration of votes in Louisiana the minority shall usurp power? These are dark days for the American people when such questions are forced upon their consideration. If it were true, as some insist, that neither the white nor the colored voters have in all instances been afforded an opportunity to give free expression to their wishes at the ballot-box, shall we, by sustaining a fraudulent and illegal declaration of the votes cast, stifle the voice of the millions of voters who have freely expressed their choice, and thus seek to correct a great wrong by committing another immeasurably greater wrong?

Can we sanction such action of the Louisiana returning board, and thereby form a precedent under the authority of which a party once in power may forever perpetuate its rule, and so end constitutional liberty? Shall such be the fate of this Republic at the beginning of the second century of its existence, is the momentous question now presented for the determination of the American people.

NEW ORLEANS, December 6, 1876.

Mr. HALE. (interrupting.) I rise to a point of order. I submit that the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The first hour has expired and the Chair now recognizes that the paper is being read in the first fifteen minutes, which are under the control of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and the balance of the thirty minutes will then be under the control of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask unanimous consent that the reading of the balance of the paper be dispensed with.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that there is now a half-hour allowed for debate.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not understand that there was any agreement that the time for debate should be extended for half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the time was extended thirty minutes, one-half of it to be under the control of each side of the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I did not understand that any such agreement was made. It is not that I object to the extension of time, but I want a longer period.

Mr. HOOKER. The objection certainly comes too late.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make objection now. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as now entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that there is now half an hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. There is half an hour for debate, and the first fifteen minutes will be under the control of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the whole of the very limited time now allowed to me. If I had the full fifteen minutes, or much more, I could not go into the merits of this great question. One or two things I wish to say in answer to questions put to me by the gentleman from New York. [Mr. COX.] There are one or two special matters in the knowledge of other republican members in relation to this question, to whom I shall yield a portion of the time.

First, I wish to say that if the gentlemen on the other side of the House are really anxious for a fair investigation into the condition of the Southern States, Louisiana included, here is an excellent opportunity to prove it by granting to the Senate the amount of appropriation that that body has in its discretion asked to conduct its investigation. I leave that for what it is worth, for gentlemen on the other side must decide how they will settle this question, their majority here being very large.

One thing more. I congratulate the other side of the House on their new-born zeal for open investigation. The country witnessed last winter committee after committee sitting in this Capitol under a system of espionage and examining ex parte testimony secretly. Now the gentleman from New York, voicing, as he claims, the sentiment of gentlemen upon the other side, demands that everything relating to this investigation shall be open and aboveboard. That is the position we have always held. In relation to this matter of the action of the returning board of Louisiana, it is a marvel to me that any member on this floor should dare to say that the sessions of the returning board of Louisiana were anything but open and free, when the very beginning of that remarkable document which has been partially read here, emanating from the democratic gentlemen who were sent to Louisiana by the democratic national committee, shows that they were present and witnessed the canvass, and I assert that there was never an hour of session after the board met that the committees on each side were not present.

There never was a time when a contested parish was reached that the whole counsel of democrats selected by the party were not invited to be present to scrutinize, and examine, and make full copies. I know of what I speak because I was there myself observing from day to day. It was open and free as daylight, and could afford to be, as there was at the bottom, as was shown, a strong and unanswerable case.

Now I do not know what will be the result of this investigation, so far as the report of gentlemen on the other side of the House shall go to show it. But with all my desire for a full examination into the situation in Louisiana, with my knowledge of democratic methods of examination, I predict that when the committee returns and the report of the majority of that side of the House is seen it will be found to follow the track indicated by the report of the democratic observers, which has been partly read here, and in which nineteen-twentieths of the space is taken up by technical quibbles and declarations that there was no election in Louisiana, that somebody else should have counted the vote, that papers did not get rightly dated and were not opened on the right day, consideration of red tape and sealing-wax, and the opening of returns, while but a finger's length is given to the great underlying question in Louisiana, by which a whole people have been defrauded of their rights in parts of the State.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asks one other question: Why did not this board appoint a democrat? This board when first coming into the exercise of its duties in 1873 was made up under the statute of Louisiana, which declared that all parties should be represented upon the board. There was upon it one gentleman representing the liberal party, one gentleman representing the conservative party, and three representing the republican party. Those were the titles of all the parties in Louisiana at the time.

When the next occasion for the exercise of their duties came around it was found that the two gentlemen who were appointed as not being republicans had come back with the republicans. They were Governor Wells and Mr. Anderson, who represent, I am glad to say, a most respectable element in Louisiana, who have of late acted with and added strength to the republican party. Then one of the gentlemen originally elected as a republican resigned his place in order that a democrat might be appointed. The place was offered to an eminent gentleman of the bar, a democrat, Hon. John M. Sandige, who declined it. Another, Mr. Ernest Arroyo, was elected and he resigned in the midst of the work of the board. When next the time came around, this year, for the board to exercise its powers and duties the place was offered to half a dozen different democrats, all of whom declined. The board naturally felt that it had not been met in a fair spirit in its efforts to fill the vacancy.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman give the names of those gentlemen who declined.

Mr. HALE. I have given one or more names.

Mr. COX. Give the names of those who last declined.

Mr. HALE. I cannot give the names.

Mr. COX. I thought so.

Mr. HALE. I have the information directly from the board.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken; not a democrat was offered the place.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HALE. I have not the time.

Mr. ELLIS. I will move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. HALE. I must yield a portion of my time to other gentlemen and cannot be further interrupted. So the board proceeded with four members, the same number being required for a quorum and to arrive at a result as would have been required had the board been full. The democratic party selected a single member and sought to force him upon the board, which was divided as to selecting him and went on with its duties. But as I said the same number was required for a quorum and to determine the result as if another member had been appointed.

I must not attempt a review of the general condition of things in Louisiana. All I can say is to repeat what I have before affirmed, that any fair investigation cannot fail to bring out the bottom facts. We have listened to column after column of reports from the committee representing the other side. But the main question is avoided and dodged and sought to be sunk under technicalities and under quibbles.

I tell these gentlemen that investigation there will disclose such a condition of things that even the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who, as he says, has not yet felt shame in his life, will blush blood-red with shame at the atrocities of certain men in his party in that State. I tell them that in many single parishes there have been acts of bloodshed and of murder, and for political opinion's sake, one-tenth part of which at any time within the last hundred years would have revolutionized the politics of the British Empire. Yet we are here treated to technicalities and told that there was no election in Louisiana. It is true that we found the truth out, and I trust that gentlemen on the other side will not balk at this paltry $20,000, but will allow this investigation to be made thoroughgoing and satisfactory to the American people.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for a few minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose of course to engage in any discussion of this general question. I should not have risen at all but for the allusion in the document just read to a report signed by myself, the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] and the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who sits near me.

It is difficult to believe that the gentlemen whose names are signed to that paper, some of whom I have known and respected, could have known its contents, or, if they knew its contents, could have known the contents of the document which they undertake to cite.

That paper grossly perverts and misstates to the American people the document which it assumes to quote. It picks out one or two sentences, mixing them up with sentences from another document coming from another quarter; and thus it is made to appear that that committee said something or came to some conclusion in derogation of the honesty or honor of the returning board of the State of Louisiana. Nothing can be found in that report imputing any fault to that board, except this: We declare that the returning board, following the precedents set them by their democratic predecessors in the same office in 1872, erred in one particular in a construction of their legal powers, which construction was clearly necessary to remedy a defect in the law. We held that where the people of a particular parish had been set upon by armed bands, prevented from making a canvass, prevented from having discussion, prevented from going to the polls and casting their votes, still, unless a particular officer certified to those facts, although he might have been intimidated himself or might have been a part of the conspiracy, there was no law in the State of Louisiana to remove that difficulty.

Mr. ELLIS. No government, the gentleman means.

Mr. HOAR. No law in the State of Louisiana to remove that difficulty. There should have been such a law. Does anybody deny it? Is it an imputation of dishonor upon the gentlemen of the returning board that, following the democratic precedent, they gave such a construction to the law in that particular as removed that clear defect?

Now as to the question in regard to the absence of government, we did not say that Governor Kellogg was not lawfully elected governor of that State. On the contrary, we declared that we believed he was so elected; and this House so recognized him on our recommendation. We said that the democratic party in 1872, conspiring with Governor Warmoth, had destroyed the legal evidence of Governor Kellogg's election, and that therefore we were obliged to resort to the less satisfactory methods which we had followed for ascertaining the real will of that people. It is true that we pointed out to the American people the grave danger that now exists. We said that it was a serious thing that the true evidence of the election of a State government should be destroyed, as it had been by the democrats of Louisiana, thus leaving us to grope in the dark in order to arrive at the true will of the people. We said, further, that the democratic party of the North, if they would but cause it to be understood that they would have no political affiliation with men who would commit murder for political purposes, could end this whole trouble in a month.

Now the question to-day is, what is the true will of the majority of the legal voters of the State of Louisiana? It is not a question of paper, of parchment, or of statute. Is it true, gentlemen on the other side of the House, that there are counties and parishes in the United States where men cannot cast their votes because they are assailed with murder and assassination? Let us know that. If it be not true, we shall all rejoice; and if the ascertainment that it is not true results in the election of a democratic President, we shall all rejoice that the stigma is removed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SPENCER.]

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the people of Louisiana upon this floor, I cannot consent to sit in silence and allow to pass without challenge the charges which have been made upon this floor this morning by gentlemen on the opposite side. Sir, I unite with those gentlemen and with every man upon this floor who desires an investigation. The people of Louisiana want an investigation of the election which was held there last November. That investigation cannot be too thorough, it cannot be too complete for us. And I now venture the prediction that when this investigation is made, when the bottom facts are found, it will be shown, as the mass of this nation already believe, that that State was carried fairly and freely by the democratic party.

Mr. Speaker, the old hue and cry of intimidation is raised again. The same thing was done in 1874. The same cry of murder, rapine, and violence went up after the election of 1874 that goes up now; and this House, then republican, sent its committee to the State of Louisiana to investigate it, with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as its chairman and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] as chairman of the subcommittee. What did that committee report? They came back here and reported to this House that they had investigated the question of intimidation; that the republican party who had control had failed to show that there was any intimidation of the blacks by the whites, but that it had appeared that intimidation had been practiced by the colored republicans upon the colored democrats. I say now—and I am perfectly willing to rest upon the proof which will be taken by this committee—that the same state of facts will be disclosed again.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we are not afraid of investigation. We court it. The whole machinery of the election law was in the hands of our adversaries. In the so-called bull-dozed parishes—East Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, West Feliciana, Ouachita, and Morehouse—United States troops were stationed at almost every poll on the day of the election; and how do you account for the fact that these are the very parishes where the colored men voted most solidly the democratic ticket? Take the parish of East Feliciana; take the parish of Ouachita. There the colored men were under the protection of the United States Army on the day of the election, and it only added to the solidity with which they voted the democratic ticket. Sir, coming from the parish of Concordia, one of the largest and most densely populated colored parishes in the State, I do not hesitate to say that, if we could have had five hundred United States soldiers stationed at the polls on the occasion of that election, it would have made a difference of 1,000 votes in favor of Mr. Tilden and General Nicholls.

Why, sir, hundreds of colored men in that parish—because I was born among them and they have known me from my infancy—hundreds of colored men in that parish came to me and told me they desired to vote the democratic ticket, but they did not dare to do it for their lives. They were threatened with social ostracism, expulsion from their churches, and it went even so far that their leaders openly and publicly advised the wives of those men who sought to join the democratic party to quit them, and in many instances it was done.

Those are the facts, sir; and yet the supervisor of that parish, a republican, made his return to the returning board, and what did he do? He excluded three of the polls in that parish from the count because of this intimidation and this violence practiced by republican colored men on democratic colored men! That fact was sanctioned by the oath of the three commissioners at every one of those polls. But did the returning board notice it? No; and yet return was made strictly in conformity with law. It was supported by the oath of the supervisor of registration that there had been such intimidation of colored men upon colored men that there was no freedom or fairness in the election. It was supported by the oath of the commissioners of election. It was supplemented by the oath of more than a hundred citizens, both republicans and democrats; and yet the returning board did not deign to notice it. O, no; because that affected the vote of the republican party.

Now, Mr. Speaker ——

Mr. NASH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Speaker, it is a very remarkable thing to me that these gentlemen, who in 1874 confessed and admitted in a report to this House that the democratic party clearly and honestly carried the State of Louisiana, should now come here and in a fit of virtuous indignation say that the State of Louisiana is essentially and necessarily republican. Did not the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] did not the present candidate for Vice-President, [Mr. WHEELER,] did not both of them recognize and report the fact that the democrats had carried the State in 1874? And yet, sir, they talk about intimidation, intimidation when the vote in 1876 is several thousand larger than ever known before.

They talk about the colored people in these parishes of East Feliciana, Baton Rouge, and Morehouse being intimidated! There were United States soldiers there. They were the only parishes where they were at the polls. Yet the result was that the colored men voted solidly for the democratic ticket.

As for that returning board, the record made by the republican party against the very individual men who constitute it is a full answer to everything that they may say upon that subject now.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will extend his time a few minutes longer.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know that I could better illustrate the character of that returning board than by reading a letter which has been addressed to it by a gentleman from the parish of De Soto; and I will send it to the desk and ask the Clerk to read it.

Several MEMBERS. O, no; let it be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask to have it printed, then, as part of my remarks.

Mr. CONGER. No; let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DE SOTO PARISH, LOUISIANA, December 12, 1876.

Hon. J. MADISON WELLS, President Louisiana Returning Board:

I have learned that your honorable body has returned me as elected to the lower house of the Legislature from the parish of De Soto. Permit me to return my thanks for the honor conferred, but at the same time permit me to say that I am unwilling to accept the position. I am a republican from the firm conviction that the principles of that party are best for the whole country.

It is also true that I was the regular nominee of the party in the parish of De Soto for the Legislature, and did more than any member of the party in that parish to organize it and advance its interests; but, sir, knowing as I do that I was fairly defeated at the polls, no intimidation or fraud having been practiced by the opposite party at any precinct in the parish, so far as I have been able to ascertain, after a thorough investigation, my self-respect will not permit me to accept the position. I hope you will pardon me for taking a step that, at first glance, may be thought calculated to cast some discredit upon the party with which I have allied myself, but I am a planter not a politician; all my interests are here, but, sir, I cannot believe the good of the State or of the national republican party can be promoted by returning as elected a candidate so clearly defeated as myself.

[Applause and laughter.]

In fact I am convinced that very much of the disturbance that has prevailed throughout the State for several years past is justly attributable to the fact that in many parishes men not elected by the people have been returned elected and maintained in office by the power of the Government. I must believe that you and your associates have been grossly deceived as to the manner in which the late canvass and election in De Soto was conducted, and as to the result.

Very respectfully,

JOHN J. LONG.

Mr. SPENCER. The conduct of the returning board in this case is only a fit conclusion to its action in the same parish in 1874. In 1874 the parish of De Soto was carried by the democratic party by 1,000 majority; and what was done in order to prevent that being counted? The supervisor of registration was one of Mr. Kellogg's appointees, and I wish it understood that there was not an election officer in the State who was not an appointee of Mr. Kellogg. That supervisor took the returns of that parish and deposited them with a lewd woman in the city of New Orleans, and offered them for sale, and in proof of this fact I quote from the report of Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR to the Forty-third Congress, as follows:

So in the parish of De Soto, in which the returns showed a conservative elected by over 1,000 majority, it was alleged that the supervisor of registration had brought the returns to New Orleans, and had left them with a woman of bad character, who offered to produce them on payment of $1,000. The conservative committee took legal proceedings to compel their production; but the court held that it had no jurisdiction to that end. They then caused to be produced before the board the duplicate of those returns from the office of the secretary of state, together with the tally-sheets, poll-lists, &c., filed there according to law. These duplicates corresponded exactly with the alleged result of the compiled returns which the said woman had produced; and of these alleged facts undisputed proof was also submitted to the board. Nevertheless, the board refused to count the vote for that parish.

And I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker: I was born in the State of Louisiana and have lived there all my life; and if anybody knows the people of that State I think I do know them. I took an active part in the canvass during the last election—I was not a candidate—and I say now that, so far as my knowledge extends, and it was extensive, that a freer, fairer election, so far as the white people were concerned, was never held in any State of this Union.

The SPEAKER. But four minutes of the time allowed for debate remain.

Mr. SPENCER. The Chair cut me off in the middle of a sentence. I desired to say that so far as the action of the white people toward the colored people was concerned an election could not be fairer, or freer from intimidation and violence.

Mr. COX. I desire to say that this side of the House did not begin this debate on the merits of this appropriation. And I desire to say to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who is now so concerned about investigations—and I say it in all good will in the hope that we may approach these questions with deliberation, moderation, and judgment—that had he been here when these resolutions for investigation were introduced, he might have saved our Speaker the trouble of giving a casting vote to carry them through the House. The gentleman says that copies of returns are all sufficient. I know that copies oftentimes in cases of ejectment, &c., after the mutilation and destruction of the originals are regarded legally as proofs; but they do not always answer the purpose morally. Moreover, I wish to say to the gentleman in correction of another statement that this year there has been no tender of a place on that board to a democrat. Last year a gentleman named Arroyer, a democrat, resigned his place on the board, because he would not be responsible for its fraud and badness. This year the democrats, according to information given me by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WATTERSON] who was down there, appealed to the board to place on it Dr. Hugh Kennedy, a Union man and a fair man. The request was refused.

And, now, where is the "shame." The shame is in hiding. I have a book here, an unabridged dictionary, from which I find that shame means—

A painful sensation excited by a consciousness of guilt.

[Laughter.]

I have no such feeling on this occasion. The gentleman says that he has felt shame. He knows, then, what shame is. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. I said you are absolutely shameless.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will preserve order.

Mr. KELLEY. I said no such thing as the gentleman from New York attributed to me. I said he was absolutely shameless.

Mr. COX. I heard no such remark from him, and was not replying to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will preserve order.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] comes here to defend his report, and tells the House that he did not make the objurgatory remarks quoted about this board, or something to that effect. He said his committee never decided that Governor Kellogg was not elected. I do not know that they did so, technically. Nobody charged that, I think. But they took away in their report the rotten foundations on which that election was based. I have here the report of January 14, 1875, and here is what the gentleman and his committee said:

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and in our opinion illegal.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, that is not an extract from the report which was signed by myself and Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. COX. The report is submitted by "GEORGE F. HOAR, chairman," and this portion of it is signed by "CHARLES FOSTER, William Walter Phelps, Clarkson N. Potter."

And the report goes on:

The evidence on which the subcommittee base their conclusions not yet being written out, will be submitted hereafter, if it shall be deemed desirable.

Mr. HOAR. I presume the gentleman from New York does not wish to get this wrong. He has been reading from the report written by Mr. Clarkson N. Potter.

Mr. COX. I am reading now what the gentleman from Massachusetts says at the end of the report. I am doing him no injustice:

The committee thereupon voted to adopt the report, and also to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the same be printed and recommitted.

For the committee,

GEO. F. HOAR, Chairman.

I did not say that the gentleman from Massachusetts wrote what I was reading a moment ago.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me half a minute to explain this.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HOAR. He certainly does not want this to be misunderstood.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has asked time from me after my own time is gone.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that the committee sent a subcommittee to New Orleans, and they made their report.

Mr. COX. I desire to have included in my remarks some extracts from this report.

Mr. HOAR. I can give an explanation in one sentence.

Mr. COX. I would allow you to explain, but my time is gone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] demands the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. That is the style, then, in which you deal with us when we want to state the facts.

Mr. COX. I have no control of the floor now.

Mr. HOAR. I only ask time to utter a single sentence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts may have the privilege he asks for.

Mr. CARR. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the objection will not be insisted on.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will object, unless two minutes in reply be allowed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts being heard, with that understanding?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to abuse the courtesy of the other side of the House by saying anything which should not be said. I only wish to say that the subcommittee went down first and made their report to the general committee. I, as chairman of the general committee, communicated that report to the House, stating that it was the report of the subcommittee of which Mr. Potter, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. Phelps were members. It was from that report of the subcommittee that my friend from New York read last. Then the whole committee went down, I myself acting as chairman, and made a report.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will not deny that the committee voted to "adopt the report" of the subcommittee.

Mr. HOAR. O, no! But they stated that they had not seen the evidence, but proceeded to lay before the House the report of the subcommittee.

Mr. COX. I believe two minutes are to be allowed to this side of the House. I will do the gentleman from Massachusetts no injustice. I was reading this sentence:

The committee thereupon voted to adopt the report, and also to report the same to the House, with the recommendation that the same be printed and recommitted.

GEO. F. HOAR,
Chairman.

They say on page 5 of the report:

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and in our opinion illegal, and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

And so again in the report, on page 8, it is said:

Indeed it is conceded by all parties that the Kellogg government is only upheld by the Federal military. Withdraw the military and that government will go down. This was true before the 4th of January as well as now.

Now my conclusion is this: that the members of a returning board so tainted with fraud through and through and standing convicted by a republican committee of this House are not the people to refuse us inquiry into the returns. It is not for them to refuse a fair investigation now being demanded by a committee of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The first question was upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the amendment of the Senate, which was read, as follows:

In section 2, strike out "$50,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$30,000."

The question was put; and there were—ayes 119, noes 69.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 82, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Cox, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Egbert, Ellis, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Henkle, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Humphreys, Hunton, Frank Jones, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Le Moyne, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McFarland, Metcalfe, Milliken, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, Neal, O'Brien, Odell, Payne, Piper, Powell, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Shakkley, Simmons, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Spencer, Stanton, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Swann, Tarbox, Terese, Terry, Thomas, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Walsh, Warner, Watterson, Erastus Wells, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Yeates, and Young—140.

NAYS—Messrs. John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Campbell, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Chittenden, Conger, Crounse, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Eames, Evans, Flye, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Hale, Haralson, Benjamin W. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Robinson, Rusk, Sampson, Schumaker, Seelye, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, White, Whiting, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth, Anderson, George A. Bagley, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bliss, Chapin, Cochrane, Crapo, Culberson, Danford, Darrall, De Bolt, Dunnell, Eden, Garfield, Glover, Hays, Hendee, Hoge, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hurd, Hurlbut, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kimball, King, Lapham, Lawrence, McMahon, Meade, Mills, Morrison, New, O'Neill, Phelps, John F. Philips, Poppleton, Purman, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Singleton, Smalls, Springer, Stephens, Thompson, Thornburgh, Washington Townsend, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Wigginton, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, Willis, and Woodburn—67.

So the amendment to the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. FOSTER said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. GARFIELD, is absent on account of sickness.

The next amendment to the amendment of the Senate was to insert in the fourth line of the second section, after the word "the," "actual and necessary;" so as to make it read: "to defray the actual and necessary expenses," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment reported to the amendment of the Senate was to insert in the fifth line, after the word "elections," the words "and other expenses necessarily incurred."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments to the amendment of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Appropriations to the original bill were read, as follows:

In the first line strike out "$21,000" and insert "$30,000" as the appropriation for expenses of House committees;

In line 4 before the word "expenses," insert the word "actual" and after the word "expenses" insert the words "necessarily incurred;"

In the fifth line, after the words "special committees," insert the words "from the House of Representatives;" and

In line 7, after the word "Florida," insert the words "and of the committee of five appointed to proceed to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City to examine into any alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting for presidential electors and representatives in Congress."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate to the title was read, as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide for the expenses of certain special committees of the House of Representatives and of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate."

The amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will now begin at three o'clock and five minutes, and the first business in order will be the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. HOLMAN. If a motion is not in order at this time to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, I will ask unanimous consent that that order be now made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that that motion is not now in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is not. I ask unanimous consent that that be done, in order that we may finish the bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule upon this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Fridays, which under Rule 128 are set apart for the consideration of private business, the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar takes precedence of the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; but upon a failure of the former motion the latter motion may be entertained on those days. If the previous question shall have been seconded upon any pending proposition, under the practice it is not in order to entertain the motion to go into Committee of the Whole until it is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that the motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill is not in order on Friday until after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. ASHE. I must object until I have submitted some reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ASHE] will be permitted to make those reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina must wait until his committee is reached during this call.

GIBBES & CO.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 3865) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE H. GIDDINGS.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 3888 a bill (H. R. No. 4208) for the relief of George H. Giddings; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask that this bill may be considered at this time.

The bill was read. It directs the Postmaster-General to pay to George H. Giddings, of Texas the sum of $2,967.43 in full of his claim for balance due for mail service on route No. 12900, from Santa Fé, New Mexico, to San Antonio, Texas.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is made, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make that point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. T. PATE AND S. Q. HOWE.

Mr. ASHE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2899) giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of William T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, now pending in said court; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEONIDAS HASKELL.

Mr. ASHE also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2000) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear and adjudicate upon the cases of the heirs and legal representatives of Leonidas Haskell, deceased, on their substantial merits; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JESSE J. SIMKINS.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. No. 4118) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House the resolution which I send to the Clerk, and to ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be and he is authorized and required to pay out——

Mr. CONGER. Is that resolution in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. ASHE. I now withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 105) for the relief of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-vessel at Wolf Trap light-station, in the State of Virginia; and

An act (S. No. 745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the brig A. S. Pennell to the City of Moule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GARFIELD, indefinitely on account of illness.

To Mr. WALKER, of New York, for two weeks on account of important business.

To Mr. BURLEIGH, for one week, on account of important business.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. COX in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to railway post office clerks, $1,125,000.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "125" and inserting "350;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation for this purpose $1,350,000. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the report of the Postmaster-General that the amount expended in paying these railway post-office clerks for the year ending June 30, 1876, was $1,278,340; $153,340 more than the amount proposed in this bill. The amount appropriated for this purpose at the last session was $1,225,000; $100,000 more than is now proposed in this bill. If the Committee on Appropriations will give me their attention for a moment, I desire to ask why they propose this year to appropriate for this purpose $100,000 less than was appropriated last year. Why do they propose to economize on the economy of last session, and to reduce an appropriation which has proved wholly inadequate for the current year? Have the committee discovered any new light showing that we appropriated last year $100,000 more than was necessary? I think not. The fact is, as we find in the report of the superintendent of railway service, that the only reason he has been able to get along during the current year with this inadequate appropriation is that the service has been very largely reduced by the cutting off of the fast mail. Mr. Vail, the superintendent of railway service, declares in his report that, on account of the inadequate appropriation, he has been obliged to reduce both the force and the salaries, and that he has been enabled to reduce the force from the fact that the fast mails were taken off from the Hudson River, the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Central, and the Southern Michigan Railroads, and from other important lines; that if this service is to be restored, as the Department is now trying to restore it, a larger appropriation must be made this year so as to furnish sufficient postal clerks to do this work.

Now I insist (and I wish the House to understand it) that the cutting down of this appropriation means the preventing of the restoration of the fast-mail service; and that is not what the people of this country want and demand; not what the intelligent people require at our hands. I am as much in favor of economy as any one; but it is no economy and no statesmanship to try to save money by cutting off the work which the people require to be done. Anybody can economize in that way. If you tell us that you will not provide for the work that we want done, of course you can save money. But we want the work done; and then let it be done at the lowest possible expense.

The people demand these mail facilities. They are in earnest about it. The intelligent people, even in the rural districts, (and I represent one of those districts,) understand this question. They demand that this service shall be kept up as it was started last year or shall be improved if need be. We know that with the fast-mail service in operation, mail communication between New York and Chicago was from twelve to twenty-four hours quicker than it is now; and so with all the points reaching West. The people demand the restoration of this service.

If, by reducing your appropriation, you could merely cut down salaries, the people might possibly endure it, though I think in such action there would be gross injustice. Supposing that you do not cut down the force but try to cut down the salaries, the present salaries of these postal clerks are only $1,150 now. Their duties call them constantly away from home, so that they must incur expense by boarding at hotels. They are now working from seven to nine hours per day, and it is the hardest kind of work, requiring them to be on their feet for hours in fast traveling trains. It is not mere manual labor that they are required to perform, although handling heavy mail-bags is hard enough work. They must have a quick eye to read the addresses of letters, quick perception and quick thought to decide in an instant which is the best and nearest route for a letter to take in reaching its destination. Now you are getting this work done at an average price of $1,150, and these employés pay all their own expenses, boarding most of the time away from their families at hotels. I declare that I know of no set of officers under this Government, no employés of any kind, who are doing so much work and such hard work for so little pay.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. One would suppose that the ingratitude of republics was absolutely without limit. I have never known any class of employés to come before this House for compensation without being informed that they are the hardest worked and poorest paid of all mortals who inhabit the face of the globe. Yet, sir, when one meets with these gentlemen everywhere one is gratified to find they are so unconscious of their misery. [Laughter.] These gentlemen are employed but one-half of the time and for the remainder of the time are to a certain extent gentlemen of elegant leisure.

Mr. MILLER. Is the gentleman quite sure of that?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are off nearly every alternate week.

Mr. MILLER. I know that the route-agents on the routes I am familiar with do not have any such leisure.

Mr. HOLMAN. It depends on the length of the route, but that is the general rule in the service. So far as we know they are a class of officials who in common with other employés of the Government perform their duties very well or at least well enough. This branch of the public service is well performed, but the gentleman from New York proposes to perpetuate the high and extravagant rates of compensation which were allowed under the system of inflation which in its gradual decline has brought us down to the reality of values.

My friend seems to attach great importance to the report of Mr. Vail. Now let me call his attention to a few of the facts. He will find in the appendix a transcript from the Treasury showing that the expenditures for the last year were $1,223,750. On page 160 we are told by the superintendent of railway mail transportation that the expenditures were $1,278,340. There is a difference of $55,000 in the two statements. The gentleman from New York is familiar with this subject and I would be glad to have him reconcile these statements, in which there is a difference of $55,000 in regard to this one item of postal railway clerks.

The gentleman will perceive that we make a reduction here of $78,000 from war times, from the salaries of the inflated period. It is a reduction of between 7 and 8 per cent.

The Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Chairman, insist that the number can be reduced without interfering with the salaries, but that if the number cannot be reduced so as to pay the present high salaries, this class of public employés, in common with other employés of the Government, shall suffer a slight reduction in what they are to receive.

The appropriation made in the last fiscal year for the present year was the result of a compromise between the two bodies. The Committee on Appropriations entertain no doubt that the appropriation of $1,125,000 for this service is ample. I am well aware that my friend from New York greatly interests himself in this question, and that he has undoubtedly studied it; but he overlooks two facts: first, the everlasting pressure brought to bear upon the Post-Office Department to increase its employés, and especially in this department, independently of any consideration of the fast-mail service. And, secondly, my friend does not propose any reduction in the salaries, when he must admit that a moderate modification of all salaries in every department of this Government is inevitable.

Mr. MILLER. Under the appropriation made last year the salaries had to be largely reduced. Now does the gentleman from Indiana propose to make a further reduction?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no: the reduction then amounted to almost nothing for the present fiscal year. I attach no importance to the appropriation for the present fiscal year, but base my judgment upon the expenditures for the last fiscal year. My friend must see that the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in the appendix, the transcript from the Treasury is to be depended upon in regard to the expenditures. That shows $1,233,250.19 was the reduction from the expenditure over last year; or between 7 and 8 per cent. And I wish to say to my friend another thing——

Mr. MILLER. Let me interrupt the gentleman right here. I see on page 9 of the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that the amount for the year 1876 is $1,278,340. The same amount is given by the superintendent of the railway mail service on page 160.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; the appropriation for salaries for the railway post-office clerks, for the year ending June, 1876, is $1,225,000, as against the expense for the year 1876 of $1,278,340. If my friend had looked on page 241, as tabulated, he would have found $1,223,750.19.

Mr. MILLER. I think that is likely an error. Look at the tabulated report on page 9.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will go over the report of the superintendent as to railway post-office clerks, route-agents, and local agents, he will find a discrepancy of over $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not regard the subject of fast-mail lines as being involved in this discussion. Still I will ask to have read the views expressed by a leading commercial newspaper of the Northwest, the Cincinnati Commercial, as to the fast-mail system as it strikes the great heart of the western country.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

The report from the Post-Office Department makes an intelligent showing of that branch of the public service. Inasmuch as the whole people have an interest in that service second only to that of the Treasury Department, the report will doubtless receive a considerable share of attention. Its patronage is large, but it will appear doubtless to most persons as less extensive, at least in its demoralizing tendency, than most persons ordinarily suppose. It will be seen that Mr. Tyner reasons himself into an appreciation of the fast-mail service even at the expense of an apparent conflict between his approval of that nonsensical experiment and his recommendations as to economy. The practical workings of the experiment should have received more of his intelligent consideration, and then he could have discovered the folly of its having increased compensation.

The practical workings of the Department are made to appear on a very good footing. Especially interesting are the statements as to the money-order system and its foreign connections.

It is to be expected that the people at large will be gratified to find that a Department in which they are so particularly and directly interested is made to appear to so good an advantage.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will perceive that, even on one of the great lines on which the fast-mail service was established, a leading commercial newspaper, and one of the fairest of the newspapers of this country, does not regard the subject with any favor. I hold in my hand an article which I have clipped from the Cincinnati Gazette, a paper which my friend is aware has occupied for half a century a leading position in that section of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thus the fast-mail train seems to have been in all matters a thing of false pretenses, crooked ways, and of no intelligent purpose. Besides, there was an odious feature in the striking unfairness of providing one city in the nation with an extraordinary train for its morning newspapers and leaving out the great cities of the interior and West, which have newspapers of equal news pretensions and of as large an area of circulation, such as Cincinnati and Chicago, not to mention others. And there was also an absurdity in running a train at extra speed one way only, and returning at the ordinary rate. Under all these circumstances of unfairness in inceptions and false pretenses as to costs and objects, it is not strange that Congress should omit to make an extra appropriation for this extra mail. A more honest, direct, fair, and efficient way of improving the mail service can be devised by ordinary intelligence and business capacity. It is to be hoped that Postmaster-General Tyner will look to such general progress rather than tie himself to the blunders of his predecessor.

Mr. HOLMAN. This was published last summer about the time the service was abolished. I do not wish to be understood, however, as myself raising any objection to the fullest facilities which the mail system can furnish. The pretense to which the Cincinnati Gazette refers was the pretense of Mr. Bangs, then superintendent of railway transportation, that it was not to be attended with any increased expense, when we discovered, ultimately, that it was a source of enormous expense; and what was still more remarkable in connection with that system was that it affected but a comparatively small portion of the Union. Even this southern line from New York and Philadelphia, by way of Cincinnati, to Saint Louis had no appreciable effect. I am not aware that any class of persons, whether engaged in commerce or not, regard the continuance or discontinuance of the line as a matter of any moment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to be able to say anything that will be of effective use to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] in the adoption of his amendment. Indeed, I should have kept silent were it not that the gentleman from Indiana has, as I conceive, made an unjust attack upon the fast-mail system. The gentleman says the fast mail added greatly to the expense of mail transportation. I do not so understand it. On the contrary, I state without fear of successful contradiction that the fast mail was cheaper than the slow mail; and I will prove it. Under the law where a railway transports 5,000 pounds daily of mail over the whole length of the road for one year the pay is $200 per mile, and for each ton of mail over the 5,000 pounds transported daily over the whole length of the road the pay is at the rate of $25 per mile in addition. To illustrate: if the road carry 10,000 pounds of mail, the pay for the first 5,000 pounds is $200 and for the second 5,000 pounds is $62.50, making the total cost for 10,000 pounds $262.50, provided it is carried upon one line of road. But suppose it is carried by two different lines of road, 5,000 pounds by each; then the Government pays each road $200, making for the two roads $400 pay for the same service that one road would have performed for $262.50. So any one can see that it is the interest of the Government to mass these great through mails upon one line of road at the minimum compensation instead of dividing the same among all the lines leading from the East to the West at the maximum compensation.

Prior to the legislation of last session the New York Central and Lake Shore furnished a special train that carried nothing but the mails, and made fast time at the lowest price for transportation. Since that time the special mail train has been discontinued and the mails are divided between several different routes at the maximum compensation. Now, in the reckless economy of last session, under the lead of the Committee on Appropriations, 10 per cent. was taken off the pay to all roads without discrimination, as well off of the cheap service that was being performed by the road that carried forty to fifty thousand pounds of mail as of the expensive high service that was being performed by the road that carried only five thousand pounds of mail. The result was that the special, exclusive mail trains were discontinued on account of the refusal of the roads to longer run the same for the diminished compensation.

Yet the gentleman, with these facts staring him in the face, makes his attack upon the fast mail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PAYMENT OF THE ELECTORAL MESSENGERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4197) to provide for the payment of the electoral messengers.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the post-office appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the clause now before the committee be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken on the motion to close debate, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. COX in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon the pending paragraph will close in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois require?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield, then, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In addition to what I have stated before, I will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the statement in the papers that a fast mail is about to be put upon some of the roads even at the diminished compensation for such service. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] says it goes into operation on Monday next. And I want to say in this connection that I believe the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] should be adopted as a measure of economy; for if you cut down the force of postal clerks who distribute the mails in transit upon the trains you will have to increase the force of clerks in the large post-offices to make the distribution of the mails as well as increase the accommodations or room for them to work in, which would be more expensive and give less speedy and effective service, and I am informed at the Post-Office Department that even now there is an increased demand at some of the largest offices for additional clerks to secure an efficient service.

Nor do I agree with the gentleman that as a rule the postal clerks are overpaid. It is a laborious, hard service, requiring fidelity, accuracy, and constant application; and I can say without fear of successful contradiction that postal clerks receive less pay for work done than any other employés of the Government.

In conclusion I will state that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in my opinion, believes he is right in opposing this amendment and opposing the fast mail; but, with due deference to the gentleman as well as to the Committee on Appropriations, I submit that in consequence of their manifold duties they have not gone to the bottom of this question.

Mr. CLYMER. It would seem to be a fair proposition that the pay of post-office route-clerks should be about that of other persons who perform like service. I think it is well known that upon most of the railroad routes of the country conductors of trains do not receive on the average more than $800 a year. I think that is the full average. Now, by the report which we have before us upon this subject, it seems that the average pay of route-agents amounts to $1,150 per year and the average about one hundred and thirty-one miles travel per day.

I think the average number of miles traveled by railroad conductors is something near two hundred miles a day, and therefore for performing one-third more service the railroad conductors receive about $350 a year less than the pay of route-agents. I think by reducing the pay of these route-agents to $1,000 a year, which would be a saving of $150 on each a year, it would effect the total saving to this service of $156,300. The cost of the service last year, according to the report, was $1,233,750. If we make the reduction I propose, the estimate furnished by the committee will be ample for the performance of this service, paying the route-agents liberally as compared with those who perform like services; for it cannot be doubted that the services of the railroad conductor, who is constantly on his feet, who has to live from home, subject to cares and duties which are not ordinarily imposed upon the class who perform similar services. I think, therefore, that the action of the committee should be sustained, as it is liberal and just and should receive the support of the Committee of the Whole.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; and on a division there were—ayes 29, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill; and read as follows:

For route-agents, $945,000.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend that clause by striking out "$945,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,050,000."

Of course, Mr. Chairman, after the very decisive vote against the amendment which I last offered, I am not going to persist in making speeches upon these amendments. The route agents, as the gentleman says, upon our railroads receive now about $950 a year. They are like postal clerks, away from their homes on expenses at hotels, and their net earnings cannot be more than $500 or $600 a year. Now, I wish the gentlemen of the committee to tell me if they believe that a class of men fit to discharge the duties of this position can be or ought to be obtained at a less sum than the average obtained by persons now performing this service, namely, $950 per year. Under the appropriation now proposed, which is very much less than the appropriation of last session for the current year, the salaries will be much less than this meager sum of $950.

I do not suppose the Committee of the Whole will give the subject very much attention, but I assure them that, if they allow this bill to pass without a larger appropriation for this branch of the public service, they will be doing great injustice to a worthy and hard-working class of public servants.

Now the gentleman says that in every case where an attempt is made to reduce salaries we hear the cry that the men to be affected by the reduction are laboring men. I will again call his attention to this fact, that these men with a salary of $950, having to board themselves away from home, do not realize as net earnings more than five or six hundred dollars a year, and are poorer paid than any class of employés under the Government. A clerkship of the first class in any Department in Washington is a sinecure compared to this; and this position requires as much talent as the clerkship and harder work.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to call attention to the fact that the expense of this service last year amounted to $940,151.97 and we appropriate $5,000 more in this bill than was expended last year, and certainly that amount ought to be sufficient.

Mr. MILLER. I speak of cost in the year 1876, and from a table which I find here it was $975,280.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that he is quoting from the report of the superintendent of railroad transportation.

Mr. MILLER. I beg pardon; I am quoting from the report of the Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. What page?

Mr. MILLER. Page 9 of the tables.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will look at the table of receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department covering the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, on pages 24 and 25 of this document, he will find that for last year the expenditures for mail-route agents were $940,151.97. By this bill we appropriate $5,000 more for this purpose than was expended last year.

Mr. MILLER. I cannot allow that statement to go out without a reply. I find here that for 1876 the expenditures for this purpose were $975,280. That appears in a table sent to us from the office of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. There must be some error.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to strike out the last word. I do not know who ought to have the last word on this question.

Mr. MILLER. I give the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. To be more certain that my vision is not imperfect I will put on my glasses and read the figures from the document. The expenditures for this service, for the year ending June 30, 1876, were $940,151.97. Has my friend the page?

Mr. MILLER. What page is it?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is page 24. The expense for the first quarter in round numbers was $230,000, for the second quarter $238,000, for the third quarter $232,000, and for the fourth quarter $239,000, making for the whole $941,151.97. And by this bill we appropriate $5,000 more for this purpose than was expended last year. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question recurred upon the amendment moved by Mr. MILLER; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The deficit provided for by the last section of this bill should be increased to the extent of $235,000 if the House shall adopt the amendment which has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole. But inasmuch as the House may think proper on consideration not to adopt that amendment, I will move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House. If the House shall adopt that amendment then the deficit can be provided for.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe but one amendment to this bill was made by the Committee of the Whole, in regard to the appropriation for the star routes and steamboat mail service. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was, in line 63 of the printed bill, to strike out "$6,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$6,237,993," so that the clause would read:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on star routes and by steamboats, and all other than railroad routes, $6,237,993.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word in regard to this amendment. I think the appropriation made by this bill for this service is sufficiently large; and it appears to me that the House should not increase it beyond the manifest necessities of the public service. I think that we have appropriated by this bill a much larger sum for mail transportation than the public service requires.

The amount appropriated for the transportation of mails by railroads is $9,000,000. A more careful examination demonstrates the fact that that amount is beyond the necessities of the public service. Indeed I think that for that purpose an appropriation of $8,800,000 would be found to be very ample; and that $6,000,000 is a sufficient appropriation for the service on the star routes and on steamboats; that I think is very manifest. Even then we would have for the expenditure of next year $342,000 more than the expenditures of last year.

My objection to the appropriation of money beyond the actual wants of the service is this: Nothing tends so much to demoralize the public service and to beget a spirit of extravagance in their expenditures as ample resources. Until within the last twenty years, I might say within the last fifteen years, Congress deemed it of the highest importance that just the sum required for a given public service and no more should be appropriated. It sought to impress upon all the employés of the Government the necessity of not using a dollar of public money beyond the wants of the service. We have all seen the effects of ample revenues. The extravagance of this Government during a number of years was actually appalling, and it grew out of the superabundant revenues. When we gathered into the Treasury $350,000,000 or $400,000,000 annually, economy was absolutely impossible.

As long as you appropriate a large margin for expenditures beyond the wants of the Government, the reign of extravagance will continue, and that, too, notwithstanding the heads of Departments may be not only honest men, but eager that the public expenditures should be kept upon a basis of fair and just economy. It is for that reason that the appropriation of money is placed especially in the charge of Congress, in order that we the representatives of the people may direct that no money shall be expended except upon their appropriation.

The various departments of the Government must realize that it is the determination of the legislative department to exercise a rigorous control over expenditures and to maintain a strict economy. Gentlemen, I do not think that you can indulge in any hope of economical government as long as you appropriate moneys that cannot be demonstrated to be absolutely necessary to the public service. I know that my friend from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will not say that he has any reason to believe that there will be required for the next fiscal year an increased expenditure of $342,000 beyond the expenditures of last year. If my friend desires to be heard upon this bill, I yield the floor to him of course. I understand from him that ten minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Speaker, I did not anticipate that this question, which was so fully discussed yesterday, would have to be gone over again to-day. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] made yesterday a gallant defense of the position of the Committee on Appropriations. In doing so, he took advantage of every point, going so far as to make the objection that no quorum had voted, although the sentiment of the majority of the House was clearly indicated. After all the debate then had, and when the vote had been taken in three different ways, it appeared that the Committee of the Whole, by a majority of 32, was in favor of my amendment. Yet now the gentleman from Indiana brings the matter up again and preaches to the House a sermon upon the general principles of economy. He exhorts us not to run into extravagance. Why, sir, yesterday, on a full discussion of this whole question, it was shown that this amendment is not at all in the direction of extravagance; that on the contrary, if it be adopted, the appropriation still falls $500,000 below the appropriation for the present year. I have shown that the Postmaster-General has never been partial to this service; that he has not used for its support even the means placed at his disposal—not because the facilities for this branch of the service were abundant; on the contrary, as I have stated, they were deficient. But although the Postmaster-General has not used for this service the means he might have used, and which the necessities of the service demanded, I have refrained from saying anything against his views. I have adopted his views in framing my amendment, and have only insisted that the House should not go below his most limited standard. My amendment merely follows the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, which I repeat is half a million dollars less than the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

I have already stated that the establishment of a large number of new mail-routes, which have been asked for, has been delayed from the last Congress to the present for reasons known to every member. Because the Senate has undertaken to attach to the post-route bill the revival of the franking privilege, that bill has not yet been finally acted on. A very large number of the new routes that would have been created were asked for in my district, and were exceedingly necessary. The failure of the post-route bill creating those new routes was one of the reasons a portion of the appropriation was not used.

Our population is increasing every year by reason of an immense immigration; and for gentlemen to maintain that because two years ago the expenditure was smaller we should not now appropriate the limited amount asked for by the Postmaster-General, who as I say has not been partial to this service—to maintain that the appropriation for this service should be reduced $240,000 below his estimate, appears to me exceedingly unreasonable.

I thought that after the question had been so fully explained, after three or four gentlemen had participated in the debate, my friend from Indiana would yield with good grace to the decision of the House. Yet he brings up this fight again. I appeal to the fairness of members here to stand by the decision they have already made upon a full hearing of the argument. The appropriation proposed by my amendment is—I will not say fair, for it is less than fair. The term "extravagance" is altogether misapplied by the gentleman from Indiana in characterizing this amendment. It provides only for necessary service. The estimate of the Postmaster-General has been made upon an exceedingly limited basis. Yet the Committee on Appropriations saw fit to go below that estimate, not for any reasons that they could state, not upon any allegation that too much is paid upon contracts or that there are too many routes, but merely upon the general views which the gentleman from Indiana now enforces again in his sermon to the House—that appropriations when made in higher sums than are required demoralize and debauch the public service and that as a general principle the House should stand upon the very lowest amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON.]

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss this question, but simply to sustain the position taken by my colleague, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.] The district which I represent in this House is larger than the State of New York; and in the bill passed at the last session, and in the bill which came before us yesterday, a number of new routes were provided for in my district as well as that of my colleague. A number of these routes were not embraced in the last advertisement of the Department; and I have good reason to believe that a large number will be omitted from the new advertisement, for the simple reason the Department says the appropriations are not sufficient to put service upon the lines proposed.

I will state further, that in the district which I represent the service has been taken off a large number of routes upon which it has been carried for a number of years; and upon other lines on which the service was twice or three times weekly it has been reduced. The only reason given is that the appropriations made by Congress are not sufficient to afford to the people the mail facilities that they have heretofore enjoyed. Yet the State of Texas is rapidly increasing in population; and instead of having its mail facilities thus curtailed they should be enlarged. If there is any object for the support of which liberal appropriations are indorsed by the people of the United States it is the mail service. This a question which more nearly than almost all others affects the great interests of the people. They will not sustain us in attempting to cut down this important branch of the public service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly I would not consent by any vote of mine to do the slightest injustice to the State of Texas or any other State of this Union. But my friend should bear in mind that in a district as old and populous as mine, settled for three-quarters of a century, not to exceed two-thirds of the routes established by law have ever had any service put upon them. I live in the country and understand, I think, the question of the necessities of local convenience.

Mr. BLAND. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Wait a moment. I must say again that if we appropriate all the money required to put mail service on every route, that instead of $37,000,000 it will require twice that amount to carry on the Post-Office Department of this Government.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman how many routes have been cut down—how much service has been withdrawn? I know it has been so in my district and I have here petitions for the restoration of service to routes where it has been dropped.

Mr. HOLMAN. The appropriation now under the control of Congress is not less than $1,000,000 above the expenditures of last year. In other words, sir, the expenditures for last year were $5,688,000, while the appropriation made for the present year is $6,737,000. My friend must see that not only is it now proposed to appropriate $579,000 more than the expenditure last year, but this is proposed at a time when every day we know more favorable contracts are being made, that where old contracts expire new ones are made at greatly reduced rates, thus reducing expenditures in this branch of the public service.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] asks us to appropriate $579,000 more than the expenditures of last year when by expiration of old contracts new contracts are made, costing only 50 per cent. of the cost of the preceding contracts.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Does not my amendment as adopted propose $500,000 less than for the present fiscal year?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it does. The appropriation for this year furnishes no criterion at all. On the contrary, we must look to the expenditure for last year. The gentleman asks us to appropriate $579,000 more than was expended last year.

Mr. CONGER. During the last year, Mr. Speaker, there were almost one thousand applications for post-offices which could not be established because there were no funds provided. During the last year there were seventy-five money-order offices refused, and a circular was sent to the places where they had been promised, saying that they were not established because the appropriation would not warrant it. In my district, where Congress has established post-routes, post-offices have been asked where men have to go fifteen miles to the nearest post-office; and I have been refused the establishment of those offices because the appropriation will not warrant it. I can repeat over and over again many more cases of that kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can say the same thing in my own neighborhood. I do not suppose there is any exception to it.

Mr. CONGER. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer it.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask whether when he says the Department asks for more money than is needed——

Mr. HOLMAN. They do not ask it.

Mr. CONGER. When he says they did not use up all the money, whether there is any refusal to use the appropriation in any portion of the country where there was money to meet it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it is within the experience of all of us that in the carrying on of this great postal system there must be some head to the Department to determine where it is proper the mail service should be established. I have neighborhoods which complain of the want of mail facilities. I presume every gentleman has. There must be some reasonable limit to the expenditures in this branch of the public service. There is no people upon the face of the globe, with anything like our extent of country, who have such mail facilities as our people have furnished for themselves. I think there is no great complaint—at least I think there is no just ground for complaint of the acts of the Post-Office Department in trying to promote reasonable economy. But Congress seems to invite extravagance by offering to the Post-Office Department, in voting for this amendment of $579,000, more than the expenditures of last year, when the appropriations were sufficient to meet the present necessities of the service.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me three minutes?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will venture it is within the knowledge of every member upon this floor that in his own district there are constant applications for increased mail facilities, which are refused and have to be refused. I venture that there is no member upon this floor but will agree with me that it is the duty of this Government, if it undertakes to carry the mail to the people, to give at least ordinary reasonable facilities to the people of the country, however sparsely settled the country may be. In counties which I have the honor to represent, there are places where there are no post-offices within fifteen, and even within twenty miles, of hundreds of inhabitants in my district, where I have urged the establishment of offices, where the petitions have been sent up to me for the last year—the last two years—and where Congress has established mail routes in order that post-offices might be established; and yet I believe, with no particular disregard of my wishes or those of my constituents, the Department is unable to comply with the reasonable demands of my people. I venture to say that that is the experience of all members that represent the newer portions of our country.

Now, if we adopt the rule that the Post-Office Department shall be self-sustaining, that the Government shall only afford facilities to those parts of the country that can pay, as the gentleman suggests, the people must pay for it themselves—let that be the determination of this Congress, and I venture to say the people of the United States will send a different set of men to determine even in regard to their postal relations with the Government. This is a crying evil. I hear complaints wherever I go, and from every member with whom I talk, that postal facilities, especially in the more sparsely settled regions of the country, are denied to the people of the United States. There is more complaint of that in my own district than of any other one thing. It is time that Congress should furnish those facilities. I have voted for these increased appropriations that those facilities may be given. There are many places in my district where money-order offices are sought to be established as self-sustaining institutions; and yet the clerks in the Department are cut down so low, as I am informed at the Department, that they cannot increase the number of money-order offices because they have not clerks enough here in Washington to examine and pass upon the accounts. Is that statesmanship? Is that economy?

I had hoped that when the excitement of the political campaign was over and members met here to legislate for the good of the country they would make such appropriations as, with a due regard to economy, should best meet the interests, the wants, and the necessities of the American people. This bill cuts down even below the appropriations of last year, which were insufficient to give these facilities. I have voted with others to increase them, and so I shall vote whenever the opportunity comes. If I could by my vote defeat the passage of this bill until proper facilities were provided for the American people in their postal service, my vote should defeat it here today and whenever it came up for action.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the observations of my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would be certainly much more potential in favoring this item of increase to the amount of $237,000 if he ever opposed any increase of expenditures. But I can bear witness to the uniform consistency of my friend from Michigan. He steadily supports every appropriation that is proposed and does it with an earnestness that gives force of argument to his utterances.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman will allow me I wish to say that, while I cannot at this moment produce it, I will at another time bring the gentleman's own statement, made on the floor of this House, that he has always found me among the most economical members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt I have been trying to conciliate my friend sometime or other.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will never do that at the expense of veracity.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I said was certainly in a general way.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House further on this item. I desire simply one fact to be borne in mind, that we are asked by this amendment to appropriate $579,000 more than the expenditures of last year, when every contract now being made is made upon a more favorable basis than the contracts which are expiring.

I do not believe in the argument that appropriations of money can be made safely if there is confidence in the integrity of the Department. You will preserve the integrity of the departments of this Government just in proportion as you remove temptation; and the more upright and honorable your Departments are in their heads, the more important it is that by the carefulness and the economy of your appropriations you impress upon every department of the Government the fact that the people through their Representatives do demand economy.

Mr. GAUSE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAUSE. It is upon the expenditures of last year that the gentleman bases his argument, is it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAUSE. I presume, then, that in his estimates for this year there is nothing for service upon the new routes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly there is.

Mr. GAUSE. The great evil we suffer from, and of which we complain, is that we have not mail contracts enough.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I tell my friend that we have provided $342,000 for that purpose by the bill as it stands.

Mr. GAUSE. Last year they reduced the contracts on our routes.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the result of the appropriations. Somebody must determine where the postal service shall be put.

Mr. GAUSE. The Postmaster-General has assured me, and I have no doubt many other gentlemen from the West and South, that it was utterly impossible for him to place service on routes established in the West and South, because he had not money appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must see that the appropriations have been ample all the time.

Mr. GAUSE. I have the assurance of the Postmaster-General to the effect I have stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. And if the House rejects this amendment there is still $342,000 for the increase of the service.

Mr. GAUSE. If the appropriations have been sufficient and the Postmaster-General has not placed service on the star lines, what has become of them?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am satisfied the Postmaster-General has only maintained reasonable economy in these expenditures. He cannot put service on every mail route.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Will the gentleman yield to me for only one minute?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I believe that there are many members of the House who do not understand to what year the gentleman from Indiana refers. This debate ranges over three years. For the present year the expenditure is unknown. The gentlemen refers to the last year, passed in June last, and we are now discussing the appropriation for the year to begin June next. The allowance made for increased demand is 5 per cent. only for each year, but it must be borne in mind that the population of Texas, in addition to the natural increase, has been very largely augmented by immigration.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have only the expenditure for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The amount of increase is allowed only 5 per cent., when the increase in our population is larger than that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am always afraid when gentlemen get on statistics and figures.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I am sure you are.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only desire to add a word further upon this measure. I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the ground assumed last fall on the stump, that the attempt on the part of the Representatives of a majority of the people for retrenchment and reform was but a spasmodic movement and purely political, has no foundation whatever. I think I can assure the gentleman from Michigan that there is a determination, so far as this side of the House is concerned, without reference to political results, to restore if possible economy and integrity to the administration of the Government, conscious at the same time that the one method in which it can be accomplished is by impressing on every department of the Government in the appropriation bills that retrenchment is demanded and must be had. I wish him to understand that the movement is not spasmodic.

The question was on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being put, there were—ayes 71, noes 45.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of William Moseley, late a hospital steward, United States Army, that the cause of his discharge from the service before the term of his enlistment expired be investigated, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Z. James Belt, John B. Price, and other citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of C. K. True, D. D., and other Methodist Episcopal clergymen of the preachers' meeting of New York City, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. MAISH: The petition of A. H. Jenks, of York, Pennsylvania, late a private in Company E, One hundred and thirty-sixth Regiment United States Army, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MACKEY: The petition of Frederick Hoffman, late a private in Company H, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, to be restored to the pension-rolls, to the same committee.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of William T. Malsters, of Baltimore, Maryland, to have paid to him out of the Treasury $3,000 retained as fines for not completing the construction of the United States steamer Laurel within the time required by the contract, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina: The petition of citizens of North Carolina, complaining of abuses by United States revenue officers and asking a change in the revenue laws, to the same committee.

By Mr. VAN VORHES: The petition of Catharine Sheets, of McConnelsville, Ohio, widow of Daniel Sheets, late captain Company C, Seventeenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, for a pension for herself and her minor son, Willie Sheets, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Civilla Shaffer, who was the wife of Emery D. Whitehair, deceased, late a private in Company F, Third Regiment West Virginia Infantry, of Amos Whitehair, and of the guardian of Elisa J. Whitehair, that a pension be granted to said Amos and Elisa Whitehair from the date of the death of said Emery D. Whitehair until they arrive at the age of sixteen years, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of Philip Henry, late a private Third Regiment Delaware Infantry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD, of New York: The petition of the National Temperance Society, (William E. Dodge, president, J. N. Stearns, secretary,) that the House of Representatives concur in the passage of the Senate bill to provide for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 16, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for the expenses of certain joint committees, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. DAVIS the conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The pending question at the adjournment yesterday was the post-office appropriation bill, which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with an amendment, upon which the previous question was seconded and the yeas and nays ordered.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was, in line 63 of the printed bill, to strike out "$6,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$6,237,993;" so that the clause would read:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on star routes and by steamboats, and all other than railroad routes, $6,237,993.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 77, not voting 111; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Bagby, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banning, Bell, Blair, Bland, Bradford, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Carr, Caswell, Cate, John B. Harris, Hartridge, Hatcher, Haymond, Henderson, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hyman, Frank Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Franklin Landers, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, McFarland, Mills, Monroe, Norton, Oliver, William A. Phillips, Powell, Rea, Reagan, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Rusk, Sampson, Schleicher, Siemons, Sparks, Stone, Swann, Terry, Thomas, Throckmorton, Van Vorhes, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Alexander S. Wallace, Walsh, G. Wiley Wells, Whitthorne, Willard, Andrew Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Ycates—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Blount, Boone, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Clymer, Cook, Cowan, Cutler, Fort, Foster, Frye, Fuller, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartzell, Holman, Humphreys, Hunton, Hurd, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Metcalfe, Milliken, Morgan, Neal, Pierce, Piper, Poppleton, Potter, John Reilly, John Robbins, Savage, Scelye, Sheakley, Singleton, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Spencer, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Teese, Turney, John L. Vance, Wait, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Warner, Warren, Erastus Wells, Whitehouse, Whiting, Alpheus S. Williams, and James Williams—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, George A. Bagley, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, William R. Brown, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Cason, Caulfield, Chapin, Cochrane, Collins, Cox, Crapo, Danford, Darrall, Davy, De Bolt, Dobbins, Douglas, Dunnell, Durand, Eden, Ellis, Five, Freeman, Garfield, Gibson, Goodin, Gunter, Hale, Hardenbergh, Harrison, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Hooker, Hopkins, Hoskins, House, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kimball, King, Lane, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lynch, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, McMahon, Meade, Miller, Money, Morrison, Mutchler, Nash, New, O'Brien, Odell, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Payne, Phelps, John F. tin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tucker, Tufts, Gilbert C. Walker, John W. Wallace, Walling, Ward, Watterson, Wheeler, White, Wiggington, Wike, Charles G. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—111.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. ELLIS, is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. DAVY. I desire to state that I am paired upon this question with my colleague, Mr. WILLIS. I am not prepared to state that I am able to state how my colleague would vote if he were present, but I should vote ay.

Mr. HOLMAN. On yesterday I called the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the amount appropriated by the second section of this bill to meet any deficiency in the revenues of the Post-Office Department might require to be changed in consequence of the action of the House. The House having agreed to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that the second section of the bill be amended by increasing the sum therein mentioned by the amount of $237,993, that being the amount added to the bill by the adoption of the amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

NEW ORLEANS, December 15, 1876.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.:

Every obstacle has been and will be interposed to hinder this committee in the discharge of its duty. Republican witnesses have been threatened, and dare not testify without incurring the loss of position and personal danger. Production of papers and telegrams is refused, it is believed, upon assurances of protection from Washington. Without the power of the House to enforce obedience to its process the committee cannot discharge its duties. The House should remain in session.

Have just received the following:

NEW YORK, December 15, 1876.

SIR: Subpœnas have been served upon several of the employés company, directing them to produce before the congressional committee of which you are chairman all the messages in the possession of the company sent and received by the persons named in the subpœnas during several months of the present year. I have delayed a reply to these demands in the expectation that similar applications would be made by a committee of the Senate, also charged with the investigation of matters connected with the presidential election and canvass in the several States, so that the action of the company, being the same in respect to the messages of both political parties, could not be attributed to a desire to prejudice or promote the interests of either. No subpœnas have yet been served upon us by order of the Senate committee, and as further delay might appear to be a discourtesy to yourself and your committee, it does not seem proper to postpone further this answer. The subpœnas were served before the investigation which the committee had been directed to make was begun, and before evidence had been presented to the committee, either that the persons named in the subpœnas had sent any messages whatever, or that any messages sent by them related to the subject-matter of the investigation.

It appears to have been assumed that persons holding high official positions under the Federal and State governments, and others prominent in public affairs, were in the habit of sending messages by telegraph, and without attempting to ascertain if any of these messages were material to the investigation, the officers and agents of this company have been commanded to lay aside the business in which they are engaged to become spies and detectives upon and informers against the customers who have reposed in us the gravest confidences concerning both their official and their private affairs. I have never believed that the Congress of the United States, with this subject fairly before them, would permit committees to violate the secrecy of the telegraph in this manner, and it seems to me that the present is an opportunity which it would be unwise to forego for obtaining a decision directly from the representatives of the people. If the messages of persons connected with one political party are spread before the public, a like course will be taken in respect to those of the other party. Both parties, therefore, have the same interest in publishing to the world the secrets of the telegraph offices, or of preventing such publicity. It has, therefore, been decided to decline very respectfully to permit the employés of this company to produce before any committee of either House of Congress messages sent or received by the representatives of either the democratic or the republican party, at least until after Congress shall have approved the subpœnas of the committees and direct that their demands be enforced.

I am, with great respect,

WILLIAM ORTON,
President.

Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, Chairman, &c., New Orleans, Louisiana.

And have made this reply:

NEW ORLEANS, December 15, 1876.

Mr. ORTON, President, &c., New York:

I have nothing to do with your motives for refusing to obey the process of the House of Representatives. My duty will be performed by invoking its aid to enforce such process. Regretting your refusal of information necessary to ascertain the whole truth as to the Louisiana election,

I am, yours respectfully,

W. R. MORRISON.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In connection with this communication from Mr. MORRISON, the chairman of the select committee now in Louisiana, I desire to submit a resolution for the consideration of the House. I will only say this, that I believe this House will not be slow to vindicate its rights and its prerogatives. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution upon which I call the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that this matter is not properly before the House, that no committee can report by telegraph.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It is a question of privilege.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, no committtee of this House is authorized to report by sending to the Speaker a telegraphic dispatch; and the Speaker has no right to lay such telegrams before the House and make them subjects for the consideration of the House to the exclusion of other business. In that respect the Chair has no right other than that of other members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from the Manual, page 136:

Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a question of privilege is involved in any proposition, he must entertain it in preference to any other business.

And lower down on the same page is an enumeration of the various questions of privilege, among which is this:

Failure or refusal of a witness to appear before committees of the House, or refusal to testify.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is not yet apprehended by the Chair. It is not that the refusal of a witness to testify is not a matter of privilege; but it is that the Speaker is to rule as to what is a privileged question on proper communications made to this House by its members; and that a telegraphic dispatch sent by a particular member is not a proper mode of communicating to this House, and not the proper mode of submitting a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman question the authenticity of the dispatch?

Mr. HOAR. I have no knowledge of the authenticity of the dispatch?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that the communication comes through the ordinary telegraphic channel.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Is not the telegram signed by the chairman of the committee?

The SPEAKER. It is sent by him.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that this purports to be a report of a commitee of a given state of facts, and that such report cannot be made to this House merely by sending a telegraphic dispatch to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have sent the resolution to the Clerk's desk and call the previous question on it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I reserve my right to object to the resolution until it is read.

Mr. CONGER. For myself and other gentlemen who were not present at the commencement of the reading of this communication, I would like very much that it be again read, or at least the first part of it.

The SPEAKER. It will be again read if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and the Clerk began the reading of the communication; but, before concluding,

Mr. WOOD, of New York, said: I object to the further reading of this communication. Every member has not only heard it read here but has read it in the papers of to-day.

Mr. KELLEY. I have neither heard it read, nor have I seen it in the papers.

The SPEAKER. This paper can only be read again by unanimous consent if the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] objects.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not objection too late, after the reading has been commenced?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. At one o'clock there is a special order that will come before the House.

Mr. HOAR. Of course the special order will be postponed if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees no difficulty in regard to that point. The Chair would rule that this, being a question of high privilege, would have to be disposed of.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Then I withdraw my objection to the second reading of these papers.

The SPEAKER. Rule 141 in regard to the reading of papers provides that—

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

That is the rule. But in this case the Chair did ask unanimous consent for the second reading of these papers, and such consent was given. In the opinion of the Chair the papers ought to be read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the dispatch of Mr. MORRISON signed officially?

The SPEAKER. The communication is addressed to the Chair as Speaker; and the Chair desires to say in reference to his ruling this morning that he finds upon examination that it is in harmony with the conduct of the House in the third session of the Thirty-third Congress in the case of W. B. Chace; in the third session of the Thirty-fourth Congress in the case of J. B. Simonton; in the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress in the case of J. D. Williamson; in the same session in the cases of John W. Wolcott and Robert W. Latham; in the third session of the Fortieth Congress in the cases of Henry Johnson, Florence Scannell, and John H. Bell; in the Forty-second Congress in the case of Joseph B. Stewart; in the second session of the Forty-third Congress in the case of Richard B. Irwin; and again in the last session of the present Congress in the case of Hallet Kilbourn.

Mr. KASSON. Will the Chair be good enough to say what point he regards as being supported by these precedents? Do they sustain the laying of a telegraphic dispatch before the House?

The SPEAKER. They sustain the point that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. KASSON. No point has been made on that. The point made was that this is a communication which does not purport to come from a committee, but is signed simply by a member of the House who is absent, and it comes in the form of a telegraphic dispatch instead of a formal communication.

The SPEAKER. The communication is addressed to the Speaker of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Undoubtedly; but the point was made that it was not a report of a committee; that it was a simple communication from a member and made by telegraph.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be permitted to state a case. Suppose the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] while en route for this city to take his seat as a member of this House should be arrested in violation of the constitutional provision that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same;" would not the Congress of the United States, upon the gentleman's telegraphic communication, have the right to take cognizance of his arrest as a violation of the privileges of the House?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir; to institute inquiry as to the facts.

The SPEAKER. Inquiry may be the purpose of the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] which has not yet been read. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] can of course reserve any point of order upon the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir, all points of order are reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the communication presented by the Speaker from Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the select committee appointed to investigate certain matters relating to the late election in Louisiana, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report at the earliest practicable moment what action this House should take in the premises to enforce its rightful authority.

Mr. KASSON. My only objection to the resolution is that it misrecites the dispatch, which is not signed "WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the select committee." [Cries of "O!" "O!"]

Mr. WOOD, of New York. All the world knows the fact of Mr. MORRISON'S official position as chairman.

Mr. KASSON. But this dispatch is not signed officially; and the difference is between the dispatch of a private member and that of the chairman of a committee.

Mr. HOAR. As I made the original point of order, I desire to say that it seems to me on reflection that the position of the Chair is entirely right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very happy to hear the gentleman say so, because he desires on all questions to rule fairly and in strict accordance with parliamentary law.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OBSEQUIES OF HON. MICHAEL C. KERR.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of submitting resolutions of respect to the memory of our late Speaker; and I ask that the resolution introduced by me, making these memorial services a special order for to-day at one o'clock, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order for Saturday, December 16, at one o'clock, shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions on the death of Hon. M. C. KERR, Speaker of this House during its last session, and the expression by the members of the esteem in which he was held for his unblemished character, for his eminent services as a Representative, and for his ability and impartiality as a presiding officer.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. MICHAEL C. KERR was born at Titusville in the State of Pennsylvania, March 15, 1827. When he was twenty-five years of age he entered upon the practice of the law in the city of New Albany, Indiana. At twenty-seven he was city attorney; at twenty-eight prosecuting attorney of Floyd County; at twenty-nine took his seat in the Legislature of Indiana; at thirty-five was the official reporter of the supreme court of that State and edited five volumes of its reports; at thirty-seven was elected to the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States and was afterward elected to the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-fourth. He died the Speaker of the House, at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. on the 19th day of August, A. D., 1876, at Rockbridge Alum Springs, in the State of Virginia, at the age of forty-nine years, five months, and four days.

Such is the brief record of one, who for twenty-two years, nearly a quarter of a century, had been selected by the people, among whom he lived, to hold important trusts.

At each step of his career, he firmly established his footing, so that it was easy to ascend. Scarcely had he been ready to surrender an office, when one more prominent was tendered him. So well did he discharge the duties assigned him, so exemplary was his conduct that the people of his district delighted to honor him. His home was in a portion of the State, which was early settled, on the Ohio River, the highway of travel. He was surrounded by able men, yet he was selected to be the recipient of such honors, as the voters of his own and adjoining counties could bestow. When he was the democratic candidate for Congress in 1872, for the State at large, he was defeated by only 162 votes, while the other democratic candidates on the State ticket, with the single exception of Thomas A. Hendricks for governor, were defeated by majorities ranging from 533 to 2,568. And in the November election following, General Grant's majority was 22,507. Yet he was not one, who could have been called a popular man. He was not all things to all men. With a will of iron, he never could have been bent from his convictions of duty. Place and power would have been too dearly bought by even the slightest concession.

He obtained the offices, which he filled by the confidence, which was felt in his integrity, so convinced was every one, that, under no circumstances, would he ever sacrifice his personal purity, the people's interests, or his country's honor. In his campaigns he was earnest, but not impassioned. He appealed to the judgment, not to the prejudices of his audience. A candidate for the Fourty-fourth Congress, differing from the greater portion of his constituents, who were members of the same party, on the financial question, he would not compromise. He made his contest squarely on that issue. Though he did not carry his district by its full democratic strength, yet he was elected by a majority of over 1,500, many of those, who did not agree with him in his financial views, were so firmly convinced of his integrity and so proud of his record, that they cast their votes for him; and yet he was opposed by a man, who had achieved a State reputation and, who, up to that time, had stood among the foremost men of the democratic party in that portion of Indiana.

Mr. KERR took his seat, for the first time, in the Thirty-ninth Congress. He early obtained a prominent position and not only maintained it, but also advanced his reputation year by year.

During the sessions when he stood upon the floor of the House, he was with the minority. It was in stormy periods; but even in the midst of debate he commanded the respect of all, and yet he was, at times, severe and denunciatory.

As the presiding officer, he was calm, dignified and impartial. What he might have been as the Speaker, had he been in perfect health, can be easily determined by what he was, when worn to a shadow, with disease preying upon his vitals and torture rending his frame. With the exception of a lack of breath and a countenance, which told of suffering, there was nothing in his manner, as a presiding officer, of the invalid, whose life hung upon a thread; there was none of the irritability, which usually accompanies the disease that is incurable.

Mr. KERR was a partisan—I mean by a "partisan" one, who does not swerve from the views and principles which are promulgated by those connected with him in a political organization, but on the contrary, with unflinching tenacity, clings to them and advocates them; carries out those measures, which advances them and endeavors with boldness and energy to place his party in power—yet, as "The Speaker," he knew neither friend nor foe, he recognized only the individual rights of the members and parliamentary law.

The moral power—unstained honor, true faith in pure motives, unswerving devotion to principle, unsullied patriotism—is, as the combination of genius and talent—or genius educated—in the mental organization, an inherent characteristic, educated and increased by the man himself, which places him upon an elevation, from which it were not possible for him to descend. This power Mr. KERR possessed.

During all the years of his public service, not a breath of suspicion was ever directed toward him until a baseless charge was brought to offset charges against other public men—a charge so unfounded and unsupported, that even his political opponents, blushed for their connection with it. His intense energy sustained him during that most extraordinary trial. When the accusation came, he asked no postponement on account of ill-health. Raising himself from what his friends knew to be his dying-bed, his strong will overcame his illness, put temporary life and vigor into his emaciated and tottering frame and bore him calm and dignified before the committee and his accuser where he demonstrated the utter falsity of the charge.

When the negative man dies there is no muffled bell tolling in the heart of the people.

He is like the worm, a part may be cut off and crushed, but each of the hundred other parts have a similar life, which still continues. But when the man of positive character—of high sense of public duty and a will to carry out at all hazards his convictions—is taken away, there is a feeling that a vacancy has been created which cannot be filled, not that a piece of the long body of humanity has been cut off and that the rest can crawl along as well without it. MICHAEL C. KERR could have led a forlorn hope. He could have breasted popular opinions and gone to the stake a martyr to his principles.

At any time the death of a pure man, an upright statesman occasions a blank which it is difficult to fill. But in an age like this, when a deviation from public probity is looked upon as a slight affair, when public men who have soiled their hands oftentimes, instead of being denounced have been indorsed by the people, then the loss of a man, who has no defilement on his person, nor a stain upon his garments, is irreparable. Years have passed, and years to come may sleep among the by-gones, and the student not be able to find a more perfect parallel to Andrew Marvel, in his firmness and decision of character, and in his pure and lofty patriotism than is afforded by the life of MICHAEL C. KERR.

Immaculate, he stands out a tall palm tree in the moral desert of the age, gladdening the heart of humanity a cheering evidence that the wells of political probity and public honesty have not all dried up. The distinguished member of this House from Massachusetts, in the Senate Chamber arraigned the public men of the day for their dishonesty and corruption. How gratifying it must be to an American, to turn from the picture he draws to the name (nomen clarum) of MICHAEL C. KERR on the monument in a cemetery of the State, which has reason to be proud of the example it has given to the country, of unimpeachable integrity.

The resistance Mr. KERR made to the advance of the disease which was to terminate his existence—the determination to occupy his place in this House in spite of the ravages made upon his system—the manner in which he endured physical and mental torture—was marvelous. He demonstrated that he had learned—

> Life's hardest lesson—without groan
> To suffer and endure.

The final summons came. The response was not merely the calm "adsum" but also the "semper paratus" of the man who felt that his life had been unspotted, and who had used well the talent which had been intrusted to him.

As—

> The days lay down their brightness,
> And bathing in splendor die,

so MICHAEL C. KERR went to his rest, surrounded by a halo of moral beauty, followed to the tomb by the regrets of the entire nation and left behind a name synonymous with public probity and public honor.

> He has done the work of a true man;
> Crown him, honor him, love him;
> Weep over him tears of woman;
> Stoop manliest brows above him!

Mr. KELLEY. The sudden death of a strong man in the vigor of early manhood fills his companions with awe and constrains the strongest and most youthful of them to pause and consider how frail may be his tenure of life. We all remember the thrill that ran through the House when, near the close of the last session of Congress, the local telegraph brought us notice of the instant death of that magnificent specimen of manhood, Hon. E. Y. Parsons, of Kentucky, whose manly beauty had commanded our admiration, and whose conversation pregnant with intelligence, wit, and humor, had charmed some of us but a little hour before.

The death of Hon. MICHAEL C. KERR was not sudden. We had all seen from day to day, or week to week, the fatal inroads disease was making on his always slender frame. In his case we saw how high purpose and overmastering will could hold death at bay; for common consent denied him three months of life from the day on which he entered upon his duties as Speaker of the House; yet it was not until after the close of an unusually long session that in the presence of his wife and only child, a son in whom he hoped his virtues would live, he welcomed death as release from pain, and with serene courage passed to the unknown.

I first met Mr. KERR when he entered the Thirty-ninth Congress, but years elapsed before I came to know him intimately. Indeed, until we were associated on the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-second Congress I had felt that we should never know each other well. Starting from almost any given stand-point in the investigation of public questions, such were our instincts or had been our early training, that we traveled in diverging lines and rested in opposite conclusions.

He seemed to me to have little special fitness for public life. He not only never attempted the arts of the demagogue, but loathed them in his inmost soul. Social life, other than the charmed circle which graced his home, seemed to offer him no attraction. His conversation was grave, and rarely, if ever, sparkled with wit or was softened by a stroke of humor. His tendencies were evidently not toward the excitement of public life. He loved his profession—the law—the labors of which were congenial to his tastes, and when he sought honor at the hands of his fellow-citizens it was in the line of that profession; thus though admitted to practice in 1852 he was elected city attorney by the people of New Albany in 1854; in the next year the citizens of Floyd County promoted him to the office of prosecuting attorney, and in 1862 the Legislature elected him reporter of the supreme court of Indiana, which office he filled till elected to the Thirty-ninth Congress. The fidelity and ability with which he performed the duties of this office is attested by the esteem in which the five volumes of reports that bear his name are held by the profession. During his service on the Committee of Ways and Means the impression I express was confirmed by the fact that he was ever ready, though his strength was even then much impaired by disease, to give special study to any question referred to the committee which involved legal intricacies or nice judicial consideration. I can recall several such cases, and remember that in reporting his judgment in each of them it was the jurist and not the politician who spoke. I am sure that all our colleagues on that committee will confirm my judgment on this point.

Yet Mr. KERR was a man of positive political convictions and had the courage of his opinions, which, on the cardinal questions that divided parties during his service in Congress, were those of his party, and his fearless expressions of them won for him its confidence in a remarkable degree. So strong was his will and so absolute were his convictions, that it was impossible for him to trim or play the time-server. In none of his numerous speeches during the time Congress was engaged in the work of reconstruction can a sentence of double or doubtful meaning be found.

On the question of the best method of raising revenue for the support of the Government and the extinguishment of the debt, he and I were in constant antagonism. He regarded duties imposed either incidentally or directly for the protection of capital ventured in manufactures in the hope of developing our natural resources and establishing our commercial independence, as a violation of the Constitution and an injury to the consumer. He would, could he have found it practicable, have abolished all custom houses, and laboring to that end he steadily strove to reduce impost duties to the lowest possible rate and to limit their application to the smallest number of articles. Here, again, the integrity of his intellect and purposes were shown. He left it to others to prate of revenue reform while really intending the establishment of free trade and the overthrow of the protective system. He had faith in the intelligence of the people, and believed that he who discussed such questions was bound to state his faith with perfect clearness, and to submit to those he would influence the arguments on which it rested.

He was a whole-hearted and courageous man, and none could know him well, as I learned to do in the committee-room and during the last session of Congress when his sufferings frequently attracted me to his side, without finding under his rigid exterior a gentleness of character and a depth of affection that was most winning.

If truth is made apparent by the vigorous conflict of opinion, and if, as I believe, the grandest treasures of a republic are its men of manly purpose and dauntless will, our country suffered greatly in the early death of Mr. KERR; for while life and strength permitted, he was ever ready to discuss with absolute integrity of purpose and expression every question that concerned the welfare of the Republic.

It must have been the strength of his convictions on political questions that tempted him to yield to the persuasive voice of friends and enter the arena of national politics, and I have often thought had it not been for the exciting labors into which he was thus drawn, his life would probably have been prolonged and his name filled an exalted place in the judicial records of his adopted State and the nation at large.

Mr. HAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled on an occasion of unusual solemnity. The late distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, Hon. MICHAEL C. KERR, is no more. He was stricken by the hand of death soon after the close of the first session of this Congress. He has passed away; his mission on earth has ceased and his labors have been finished. We shall see his face and hear his voice no more, but his good name, his well-earned fame, and his noble qualities still live in the memory of all who knew him, and will not be soon forgotten. Universal sympathy was extended to him during his protracted sufferings from mortal disease, and the whole country beheld with surprise and admiration the pertinacity and bravery exhibited by him in the discharge of the responsible and laborious duties of his office. A nation, without respect to party, mourns his untimely departure, and it becomes appropriately the duty of those who were his associates on this floor to render a heartfelt and formal tribute of respect to his memory.

It is a charitable sentiment, at least, that no one should speak ill of the dead; that their errors, faults, and frailties, whatever they may have been, should be covered by the mantle of oblivion; but it does not follow from this that their virtues, their endearing qualities, their noble deeds and valuable services to the state should remain unrecorded and suffered to pass without appropriate notice and action on the part of their associates and survivors. These should be appropriately recorded and transmitted that the light which once shone and illumined the pathway of thousands should not return to darkness. It is a duty devolving upon the living to perpetuate the memory of those who were good or great, who achieved distinction in some department or sphere of life, who filled high positions with credit to themselves and benefit to their country, and who by their talents or genius have rendered valuable service to mankind. The character and personal history of such belong to the people, and should descend as a legacy to posterity. What is a country without a biography of its distinguished men and its public benefactors? What a blank would there have been in the history of Greece and Rome if there had been no biographical sketches or special mention made of their philosopher, poets, orators, statesmen, and heroes? It would have been a shadow without substance; a skeleton divested of those vital parts essential to form—life and beauty. The character of a nation and the criterion of its civilization may be judged by the intelligence, honesty, and purity of those who are appointed its rulers. It is our boast to rejoice in the eminent qualities of the founders of this Republic. While the spirit of freedom pervades the minds of the American people they cannot cease to hold in veneration the illustrious champions of independence. The names of Washington, Adams, Franklin, Jay and Hamilton, Marshall and Jefferson, will be handed down from generation to generation and sounded with praise while free institutions exist upon the earth. Those names will be transmitted as synonyms of great ideas—liberty and self-government.

The duties and responsibilities of men never cease. Each generation at every stage of progress, will have new perplexities to encounter, new labors to perform, and new difficulties to surmount. "Peace hath its victories no less renowned than war," and to the statesman of the present time there is open a wide and constantly expanding field of usefulness, in which there is room for the exercise of disinterested patriotism, of the highest order of abilities, and of the most diversified and extensive knowledge. Hence while our Government endures new events will enter into its history and new actors from time to time will appear upon the political stage. Their names will deserve to be honored for whatever valuable service they may render to the country, for their eminent qualities, and for their fidelity to the great principles of self-government.

The name of the late Speaker deserves to be mentioned in honorable connection with his departed and distinguished predecessors. I shall make but few allusions to his personal history, but leave this duty to those who have been longer and more intimately acquainted with him than myself; and what has been already said in this respect by others need not be repeated by me. No fulsome adulation can add anything to his well-earned reputation or to the perpetuity of his fame. I shall attempt nothing beyond what a brief personal acquaintance with him, the impressions formed of his character, and what may be inferred from his public acts, will justify me in stating. Though cut down in the prime of life, at that period when the mental faculties had just attained their full development, he had already achieved distinction in his own State for his public services and sterling ability, and had also won for himself a national reputation as a legislator.

Mr. KERR was endowed by nature with a strong and well-balanced intellect. It was of the synthetic order and peculiarly adapted to the investigation of subjects requiring the highest reasoning powers.

Though an able and forcible speaker, he was not gifted with the commanding eloquence of a Clay or Webster, but as a practical statesman he evinced unusual sagacity and a thorough comprehension of public affairs as well as of the theory and powers of the Federal Government. With ample opportunities, health, and years, he would have ranked among the foremost statesmen the country has produced. His talents were of a high order, but he did not alone trust to natural endowments. His life from early age was that of an ardent and indefatigable student. His chief ambition was to acquire knowledge and gain mastery of whatever he undertook. His pecuniary circumstances in early life were very limited, but his ambition to obtain a good education, both literary and professional, was reached by his devotion to hard study and by his indomitable perseverance. A successful career of professional life opened before him. His talents and qualifications were duly appreciated. He had but fairly entered upon this course when he was called by the people to important public trusts.

As a member of the Legislature of Indiana, as a reporter of the supreme court of that State, as a Representative in Congress and Speaker of the House of Representatives, he discharged every duty with unswerving fidelity and with rare ability. In every capacity of public employment which he was elected to fill he exhibited the traits of honesty, inflexible integrity, and a sacred regard for the inviolability of public trust.

His honesty, purity of character, and integrity were unimpeachable and above suspicion. He never compromised his principles for the sake of expediency, but carried his convictions of justice, honor, and right into whatever he undertook. He guarded the public interests intrusted in his hands with the same jealousy and care that he would his own private affairs. He occupied a position in American politics similar to that attributed to Aristides, "surnamed the just," in the affairs of Athens. Like the great "commoner" Henry Clay, he "would rather be right than President."

A man's character is generally formed by himself. Adventitious circumstances may divert the mind into unexpected channels for a while, but when there is an inflexible purpose founded upon sound convictions, the character of the man will be molded in accordance therewith.

Mr. KERR shaped the course of his life in pursuance to a fixed purpose. The acquisition of knowledge was one of the chief objects of his life, and his assiduity and perseverance to obtain this end were seldom equaled. He had none of that ambition that would lead him to aspire to places of honor by any means that would conflict with his well-confirmed notions of justice, morality, and integrity. He had no sectional ambition or animosity to gratify. His patriotism was of that character not bounded by State lines, but which comprehended the interests of the entire country. He was ever a champion of the great principles of self-government and constitutional liberty. He was ever jealous and watchful of all encroachments of power against the bulwark of freedom, the Federal Constitution.

His recent services as Speaker of this House affords us a clear conception of his nature and the sublime traits of his character. In pursuance to his convictions of duty, he essayed each day to preside over the deliberations of the House, and only retired from his post when his wearied and exhausted frame would no longer permit him to remain. His indomitable will and wonderful energies supported him after it was apparent that his physical powers were unequal to the task. But hope seemed to cheer him on with its delusive promises. His mind was clear and unsubdued, while the earthly tabernacle was sinking from the consuming fires within. Summer came, and its depressing heat, so overcame him that he was at length forced to abandon his post of duty, leave the city, and seek refuge in the salubrious atmosphere amid the mountains of Virginia. But the change produced only a temporary effect. His soul calmly resigned the tenement no longer fitted to retain it, and took its peaceful flight to that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The death of such a man as the late Speaker, at this perplexing period of our history, is a national calamity.

His broad patriotism, his unsullied integrity, and his unswerving fidelity to principle and justice, were such as commanded the respect of the whole country, and would have proved invaluable had he continued with us. The Commonwealth whose interests he has so faithfully guarded will long miss his services in the national councils, and mourn the loss of one of her brightest jewels.

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, This was a man.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I was not favored with such a degree of intimacy with the late distinguished Speaker of this House as was enjoyed by many members, and hence may not present so accurate, and certainly cannot present so complete, a view of his character as could others. But such opportunity as I had to become acquainted with him greatly interested me, and it may not be amiss to state frankly just the impression which his qualities of mind and heart made upon me.

In listening to him, whether in conversation or in debate, the first quality which arrested attention was his intellectual clearness. His thought came to him well defined and in a strong light. He had a certain, definite thing to say; he knew precisely what it was and what he wished to accomplish by saying it. What he clearly saw, he clearly communicated. The hearer could seldom be in doubt as to his meaning. He was called reticent. But until he could think and speak clearly, he had nothing to say. The habit of his mind could accept no other conditions of speech. In debate, his single aim was to be understood. No temptation to appear eloquent or sparkling could turn him aside from this end. His mind rejected ornament. Illustration by means of comparison and figures of speech, he did not much need. A severe simplicity and directness marked all his efforts.

With this perspicuity of thought and expression, not unnaturally was associated a high degree of intellectual force. He had power of statement, felicity in arrangement, logical skill, and depth of conviction. These qualities gave great vigor and effectiveness to his discourse. His argument always looked strong, if not impregnable, and he was always in earnest. One who differed from him and refused to accept his conclusions, was compelled to admit that they were urged with a certain convincing force which it was not easy to resist.

To these intellectual qualities must be added another which was largely moral—the judicial candor and fairness of his mind. This was not always very apparent upon first acquaintance. He exhibited a certain outward severity in debate which did not give promise of that capacity for impartial judgment which he really possessed. His sharp-cut sentences sometimes wounded the feelings and gave offense. But further acquaintance showed that this sternness was more of manner than of spirit. It was in great measure due to nervous conditions resulting from ill-health, and did injustice to his real character. One who approached him to call attention to new aspects of questions under discussion, found him not only an attentive listener but often willing to admit a measurable modification of his own views. His convictions, when clearly formed, were, no doubt, firmly held; but he antagonized principles rather than men, and respected the character and the argument of his opponent. This quality of judicial fairness became more apparent after his election to the office of Speaker. I think it must then have been evident to the whole House that it was his earnest desire to administer the duties of his high place with perfect impartiality.

Closely allied to this quality of judicial candor was his undoubted goodness of heart. It must be admitted that this, also, was not always freely acknowledged at first. In the Forty-second Congress I sometimes heard him spoken of as cold, reserved, and unsympathetic. But those who knew him well felt that this coldness was superficial. It sprung in part from a diffidence which was both genuine and creditable. The really modest estimate which he placed upon his own powers and accomplishments, made him slow to engage the attention of others, except as duty demanded. His reserved manner grew, in part, also, out of the state of his health. We sometimes forget, that that uninterrupted flow of cordial feeling which is so charmingly expressed in the manner of some men, is often as much the result of sound physical conditions as of sweetness of disposition. We should not mistake a bad digestion for a bad heart or confound a torpid liver with moral indifference to the happiness of others. All who had admission to the inner circle of his friendships bear witness, that he was essentially warm-hearted, kindly, and affectionate, and that his attachments were as tenacious and enduring as they were disinterested and cordial. That he deeply appreciated kindness and a just estimation from others, was especially evident on one marked occasion, when several gentlemen had shown a friendly interest in his good name, upon this floor. With tears coursing down his cheeks he said to a distinguished member of this House, "Convey to those gentlemen the thanks of a dying man." It was done, and the message was received with a feeling almost as deep as that which prompted it.

But, after all, the distinguished and crowning virtue of his character was his absolute integrity and uprightness. Of course I do not mean merely that he was honest and pure in all pecuniary affairs, but that he had a hearty love for truth and rectitude for their own sake and in all their applications. He had the keenest sense of honor and feared a stain upon his fame more than political defeat—more than death. A fact bearing upon this point I have from the best authority—that of his able successor in this place. The last time he was nominated for Congress it was well known that he was, in the phrase of the day, "a hard-money man." But there were large numbers of "soft-money men" in his district, and his friends feared that the open advocacy of his views would greatly reduce his majority, if it did not result in his defeat. A committee waited upon him and suggested that it might be more prudent in his addresses to the people not to speak at length upon the importance of a return to specie payments. "Gentlemen," was his reply, "it would be better that I should be defeated, and that my party should be defeated in me, than that I should knowingly lead one man to vote for me under a delusion."

To conclude, though often weak in body he was thoroughly strong and sound in all that constitutes a rational being—sound in mind, sound in heart, sound in character; and he died, as such a man might be expected to die, in the profession of that Christian faith whose mission it is to impart health and soundness to the race of man.

To us it belongs to speak rather of character as it is revealed to us here than of the destiny which awaits it hereafter; but as I sat this morning pondering my sad and yet inspiring theme, there involuntarily recurred to me the well-known lines of that remarkable man of our time who has written the sweetest and most thoughtful memorial poetry in all literature:

> And, doubtless, unto him is given
> A life that bears immortal fruit
> In such great offices as suit
> The full grown energies of heaven.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the closing hour of the last session of Congress, as we were preparing to leave this Hall and return after a weary absence to the blessed shelter of our homes, in the midst of the tumult and excitement incident to that event, there was a pervading sentiment that we could not adjourn without expressing to MICHAEL C. KERR, the then honored Speaker of this House, then absent from the capital and seeking in the mountains of Virginia a reinvigoration of his failing powers, some words of sympathy; and we all remember how well the universal sentiment of this House was expressed by the eloquent and kindly words of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] This message of friendship and of generous sympathy from his associates in a high public trust, from this House representing the views and guarding the fortunes of a great people, was the last utterance that fell upon his ear from the great theater on which his own high reputation had been achieved, and from which he had so recently withdrawn never to return. Who shall say how soothing and consoling this message was to our departed friend in that final vicissitude of life! As it fell from the lips of his distinguished associate and friend, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who shall say how it buoyed up his drooping spirits! The sympathy of a nation, mingling with the love of wife and child and friends, closing the one life even while the new opened with glimpses of the infinite and the immortal!

We had scarcely reached our homes when the announcement came, MICHAEL C. KERR is dead, and the heart of a great people uttered a sigh of regret. MICHAEL C. KERR had scarcely reached the prime of his manhood; he had been in public life for a comparatively brief period; and yet his natural abilities and attainments and the struggles of an honorable ambition had placed him in the foremost rank of the citizens of the Republic, while his just conceptions of public duty, his singleness of purpose to promote the general welfare in the employment of political power, and, above all, the severe and impartial integrity of his judgment in public affairs had secured to him respect and confidence of a great people. Surely his was a fortunate life; fortunate for his country, of high honor for himself.

Mr. KERR, with more than ordinary attainments in the general field of intellectual culture, had devoted his most valuable and maturer years to the learning connected with his public duties. His chief study was the science of government, the laws of political economy, and the principles of the social fabric of life in its relations to the State. He was not an enthusiast, but a severe and impartial seeker after truth. He was in no sense a Utopian. His opinions were based on precedents and the teachings of history, and he questioned with impartial purpose the institutions of government which have perished as well as those which have survived for the just principles of political society and the true relations of the citizen to the state. His opinions were convictions, and he stood by them with unflinching courage. His temper was neither compromising or conciliatory; he sought to convince, not to persuade, and shrank from no contest where his principles were involved. He had carefully studied the early history of the Republic, and was thoroughly imbued with the spirit and the opinions of its founders. He esteemed the vigorous maintenance of constitutional limitations on delegated power the most perfect safeguard of public liberty that human intelligence could devise. His theories of the social compact limited the domain of government to the maintenance of public order and the administration of justice, leaving all else to the untrammeled enterprise of the citizen and the moral power that springs from self-reliance, enlightened conscience, and cultivated intelligence of the people.

He was a true American, and gloried in the commanding influence of his country among the nations; and following the result of his deductions as to the just principles of government, as an outgrowth of the implied social compact, he believed in the fraternity of the nations, "that the world of mankind should not be considered in fragments, but that all peoples were reciprocally dependent;" hence he insisted that the intercourse of the nations should be untrammeled, that true statesmanship would bring the cultivated world together, and that commerce should be free.

As a legislator Mr. KERR accepted the maxim "the world is governed too much." He abhored special and class legislation and every form of monopoly, demanding the just equality of all the citizens of the state. He held that a plain, simple government, with severe limitations on delegated powers, frugally administered, was the noblest outgrowth of the cultivated intelligence of our age.

While neither impulsive nor an enthusiast, but cool, dispassionate, and logical in his mental organization, he was most earnest and devoted in his friendships, but asked nor gave quarter in conflicts of opinion. He was frank, ingenuous, and incapable of deception, a lover of truth and justice, controlled by a high sense of duty, even if time shall here and there demonstrate, as it reasonably may, the fallibility of his judgments, (and what perfection in judgment or attainments in statesmanship can escape this?) the records of Congress will for all coming time bear testimony with what unswerving fidelity, in the light of his conscientious convictions he fulfilled his high trust as a representative of the people. He followed his principles without fear or hesitation to their logical results as a Representative on this floor. No fear of the consequences to himself deterred him. He yielded without reserve to the mastery of his convictions, and trusted to time and events to vindicate the integrity of his opinions.

Mr. KERR was not in the ordinary sense of the term an orator. He never seemed to speak with a view to rhetorical effect. He seldom if ever appealed to the passions or prejudices of his hearers; yet he was the master of a very high order of eloquence. He had a complete mastery of the English language. His style of composition was elevated and elegant, compact, clear, and logical; his delivery at times fervid or impassioned, and always clear, distinct, and powerful. In the current debates on this floor his distinct, concise, positive, and logical method of reasoning never failed to arrest the attention of the House.

Mr. KERR was not only an intellectual man, but his will was absolutely the master—a mastery that only death itself could subdue. After his election as Speaker of this House, surrounded by embarrassment in arranging the details of organization, prostrated by a fatal malady, feeble and suffering, he applied himself to the task with unfaltering purpose. When he left this Hall never to return, with the hand of death upon him, the fortitude of his mind was unshaken. The fresh breezes of the mountains did not arrest the decay of nature, and with the fortitude of a Christian and the composure of a sage, assured of an honorable remembrance by his country, he met the inevitable fate—

> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

MICHAEL C. KERR is dead. The record of a good life is complete. May that record perpetuate his virtues and the services he has rendered to his country as long as time shall endure.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, although Death with busy hand has repeatedly snatched Senators and Representatives from the post of duty, never before has he stalked boldly into this Hall and taken away a Speaker of the House—its presiding officer and head.

During this Congress the grim tyrant has unmistakenly displayed his resistless power and remorseless will. When the Representatives assembled one year ago, at the commencement of the first regular session, the Capitol was draped in mourning. Henry Wilson, Vice-President of the United States, had been stricken and numbered with the dead. His mortal remains, with national honors, as became the office and the man, had been borne to their last resting-place in the bosom of the Commonwealth he so warmly loved and so long represented.

Again assembled, the somber emblems of sorrow that surround the vacant Speaker's seat and front the waiting Representatives anticipate the official announcement that MICHAEL C. KERR, the Speaker of the House, for the last time has presided over its deliberations. To-day we banish the excitement of legislative debate and withdraw our thoughts from the great events and grave and momentous questions of the hour, to bestow the accustomed and merited honors and pay a grateful tribute to the memory of a friend and associate, a Representative of the people, and a presiding officer of the House.

Rightly to estimate the public character and services of MICHAEL C. KERR, it must be considered in connection with the times in which he lived and the great questions in which he took a part.

Mr. KERR entered congressional life in the closing scenes of a historic drama, played by real and living characters in successive acts, which opened with legislative discussion, culminated in bloody strife, and ended in the establishment of universal liberty and political equality throughout the nation. For nearly a century slavery, the evil genius of American institutions, presaged disaster and endangered the perpetuity of the Union. Its overthrow and utter annihilation was the grand historic event in the first century of the Republic. Its constitutional prohibition had already been secured (and the last of the confederate forces had surrendered) when in December, 1865, Mr. KERR became a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress as Representative from the State of Indiana. He, with the other statesmen of that Congress, was brought at once to consider what plan was safest and wisest for the restoration of the seceding States to their practical relations to the Union. Great constitutional and legal questions were involved.

His mind, trained to habits of logical reasoning and judicial investigation, subjected every measure to the closest scrutiny. He did not shrink from encountering in debate upon these subjects the oldest and most experienced members of the House. By apt citation of precedent or authority in support of his views he at once took rank as an able debater and diligent student of constitutional law.

A strict constructionist in interpreting the grants of Federal power, he sharply criticised and earnestly opposed the policy and measures then adopted as the basis of reconstruction in the seceding States. We are perhaps too near and many of us have been too prominent actors to be able to pass unbiased judgment upon the results achieved or failures that may have ensued. If fears have not been realized, and evils predicted and objections urged have proved illusory, we cannot say that an opposition which secures more deliberate consideration and seeks to point out supposed defects and injurious consequences is profitless.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. KERR commenced in the Forty-first Congress, and by assignment to the same committee-duty in the Forty-second Congress our personal association became frequent and intimate. In the daily discussions of great public interests and economic questions, for months under consideration in that Congress, no one who heard Mr. KERR in committee or on the floor will deny him honesty of purpose, fearlessness in the avowal of his convictions, and ability in presenting and explaining his conclusions. He rose above personal considerations. Friendship could not allure him to support a measure he disapproved. He despised all shams and pretenses. He was a stranger to deceit. He gave no comforting assurances to a claimant with a hopeless case. Special legislation was his aversion. He hated monopolies and congressional favoritism. His bold and manly course in avowing and advocating a financial policy at variance with the supposed current of popular opinion in his own State challenged the admiration and won the respect of even political opponents, as well as the thoughtful men of the country. It doubtless made him Speaker of this House. In that high position he did not disappoint the expectations of friends or the country.

In his rulings and decisions all acknowledged that he aimed to be, as a worthy Speaker should, impartial, just, fair, and absolutely right. He presided with dignity, observing as well as exacting the courtesy due to members and to the Chair.

Such was the record and impression made by the late Speaker ere declining strength compelled him to designate other occupants, and finally leave the Chair in order to seek restoration of failing health away from the exciting scenes of congressional life.

The hopes and prayers of a devoted wife and loving son, the ministrations of watchful friends, were vain and futile. Amid the then incipient excitement and rising storm of political discussion and partisan passion incident to a presidential campaign, his peaceful spirit deserted its earthly tenement and was wafted to its eternal rest.

Thus the all-conquerer, again exulting, reminds us of his resistless power. The law-maker is not beyond his mandate. The mighty and the lowly are alike subject to his will. But death triumphs only over man's mortal frame. Its material elements dissolve and commingle with their mother-earth. Dust returns to dust. But this is the limit to death's power.

The man, his character and achievements still survive in memory, in influence, and far-reaching results.

Great deeds, grand heroic words, and thoughts beautiful or sublime strike responsive chords and are re-echoed and reproduced in other sympathetic souls. They live and inspire, mold, guide, and sway present and future generations.

The manly form of MICHAEL C. KERR will never again enter this Hall. He rests from his labors and conflicts. Triumphs and honors cannot allure him to earthly scenes.

His mortal remains are moldering in the dust, but his lofty character, his example, and influence will live and remind us that manly sincerity, integrity, and honesty of purpose ennoble and exalt the possessor more than high position and earthly honors.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the Representatives of thirty-seven independent States this day pause in their deliberations for the welfare of forty-five millions of people to offer to the memory of a great and good man the solemn anguish of a nation for its loss, and their sympathy with a family and a constituency in their bereavement.

The lapse of time which heals up the green and bleeding wounds of sorrow, and which makes too often ceremonies like this the mere mockery of woe, has had no balm save that which preserves the recollection of our friend, no dew of refreshing save the sweet dew of his memory.

It is eminently fitting that this House should place upon the tomb of its late presiding officer, and the third officer of the Government a civic crown!

The catalogue of American representatives is a catalogue of mortality. Our political system has in it much of popular caprice, and more of providential vicissitude. Of those that were here when I first entered this Hall but four or five remain. As I look about this Hall I perceive one and only one of my Ohio colleagues [Mr. W. S. Groesbeck] who was a member of the Thirty-fifth Congress; and he will share my thought and feeling. The first death which we were called upon to mourn was that of a beloved southern statesman and soldier, John A. Quitman. Subsequently and how frequently have others fallen!

I feel almost isolated, standing between the many dead, who were friends, and the living who in a few years will be numbered with the dead; but in all these chances and changes of time it has been my lot to cheer and not to sadden. In the home and among kindred for two generations it was not for me to weep, but to dry the tear of others. When the great moan went up that Douglas was indeed dead, and in that solemn hour for the country, I came forth to the stricken men who surrounded my Ohio home to hear the last telegraph—not to mourn but to comfort them with hope. In the dark hour when the country was filled with battle-cries and blood, I lifted on high, not the wail of Jeremiah, but the joy of Isaiah—in the hope that soon the waste-places would be built up and the old leaf and bloom return with the spring. I tried to bring good tidings to bind up the broken-hearted, and to them that mourn in Zion—to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

On another and recent occasion, and as the shadows gathered over the Rockbridge Mountains, it was my place to give what of comfort I could, by fringing the cloud with golden hope to the stricken. But on this occasion it is my privilege and my infinite relief to mourn as one who has not merely lost a friend, but as a citizen who has lost a compatriot, and, as a Representative, to deplore a brother who in this dire trial of our institutions is not with us to guide.

It may not be out of place here to say that, in spite of marked contrasts of character, I shared with Mr. KERR many of the burdens, studies, and sympathies of life. It was a sad pleasure to stand with him at the last, on the shore of that vast ocean which he knew that he must sail so soon. Racked with more than mortal anguish in his last sickness; harassed with a false accusation which touched the very heart and marrow of his character; his body shrinking and shrinking to the very imagery of death the skeleton; yet his spirit was as calm as a still, sweet morning—as it rises above yonder azure mountains where he died, and his will as firm as their rocky base. Unappalled by the terrors of the unknown world, he passed away out of the beautiful valley where he sojourned into the valley of the shadow. Naught remained but the mere phantom of a body. This was borne to his home in Indiana. The theme over his remains was well chosen: "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." Until the last flower faded from the earth around his home, loving crowds thronged to the cemetery, and every Sabbath his friends and constituents made their pilgrimages to lay, with their sympathy, immortelles upon his grave.

He died at the Alum Springs, West Virginia. It is an old resort, an intervale of beauty, a charming little park sweetly embosomed in the Blue Ridge; a lonely spot, with now and then a habitation, but with a bracing air, a splendid forest, and grand mountains. There is a primeval quietude there, almost a summer afternoon feeling, as if the lotus eaters of Tennyson had made it a resort aloof from the cries of people that do come and go. The only noise is that of murmuring waters. It was amid these solemn silences that his last weeks and hours were passed. It was amid those remote and pleasant nooks of nature that God unloosed his weary star. His was no sudden call. All preparations, secular and spiritual, possible were made by his own direction. The silver cord was not cut hurriedly, nor the golden bowl broken in an instant. No holocaust of fire snapped his life's cord suddenly. The cord was gently untied; the golden bowl melted away as if it were a scarf of vapory amethyst, or rather as the light fades away from the firmament at the coming on of evening mild. Just as the sun went down, his spirit peacefully departed. The pearl dropped from its wasted shell, as the sun passed behind the mountain. There he lay in the lap of a lovelier nature by stiller streams and fairer meadows than we are wont to fancy in some blest Aready; but when death came it seemed to make the beauty of the mountains as barren as the desert; the flowers and leafage and rocks and hills lost their charm, the breeze its freshness, the song of birds its music, and the sweet shine of the sun was all joyless.

> But in the mountains did he feel his faith.
> All things responsive to the writing there
> Breathed immortality, revolving life,
> And greatness still revolving—infinite.
> There littleness was not; the least of things > Seemed infinite.

What was that faith? I could not speak truly and say it was the accepted dogmas of any church. He could no more be a mystygogue than a demagogue. If he could not accept all that was written about the Saviour, he fully sanctioned and truly lived up to the code of morals which Christ gave. He believed an honest man to be the best Christian. His plan of life was to get all the knowledge he could, and use it in doing all the good which he could.

Though his life may have seemed to some reserved, yet his austerity was but the visor which concealed generosity, tenderness, and trustfulness. He sympathized with all men, and only repelled those who were exacting and dishonest. His faith was in honest work. It was characteristics like these that made his home a sacred spot, refined and beautiful, ennobled by delightful intimacies and old-fashioned hospitality. It is not a new standard by which he regulated his life. Laborare est orare, is as old as the fathers of the church. That he made integrity his religion, work his orizon, and truth his idolatry, is only repeating the words of the wise and good of all ages. He wrought

> With human hands, the creed of creeds
> In loveliness of perfect deeds.

To be kind to the widow and fatherless was one of its canons; and this man never in his profession would receive a reward for serving them! To be faithful to his public trust—and this man no more flinched from uttering unpopular, than worthy thoughts. Pericles in his last illness said: "No Athenian in consequence of any action of mine had ever put on mourning." Mr. KERR could truthfully say the same in a better sense.

When I went at his request to Virginia and to his bedside, and after delivering the messages from his friends here, I asked him if he were ready to meet the unseen world; with a glance of gentleness, and a pressure of my hand, he declared that he was ready. We talked of the mysterious realm. His faith was abiding that in that future there was reward for a just life here. As he said, half playfully, he stood upon his record.

It was this pious probity which he impressed upon his people, upon Congress, upon his own life, and upon his son. It had its source in the heart as well as the head. This is especially observable in the care which he gave to his son's tuition, even to the last hours of his life. He seldom left his house on his return from his office. As has been so well said by his colleague, [Mr. HAMILTON,] who offered these resolutions, he scarcely mingled with the masses of the people, even his own constituents, but with kind cheerfulness was wont to retire to his home and library. There he studied his favorite authors, examined his son in the studies of the day, and filled up each hour with some useful thought or exercise. The speech of Plato to the Athenians he expressed in his life: "For the glory of parents is an excellent and an honorable treasure to their children, making up for the lack of possessions and dignities." "Jos est magna parentium virtus." (Hor. Od., xxiv, lib. 3.) May I not read from the Chicago Times the record of his last advice to his son to illustrate the paternal care and gentle worth of this our best representative man?

> A few days before his death Mr. KERR had a conversation with his son, in the course of which he said: "I have nothing to leave you, my son, except my good name. Guard it and your mother's honor, and live as I have lived." He further said: "Pay all my debts, if my estate will warrant it without leaving your mother penniless. Otherwise pay what you can, and then go to my creditors and tell them the truth, and pledge your honor to wipe out the indebtedness.

The source of this man's power was not altogether intellectual; it was in the affections. What a void has been made in his western home! Who can tell the anguish of the bereaved! Even the delights of the old home in the West intensified it. "She was at home," writes the bereaved son of the widowed mother, "among friends; but she could not feel at home, for he was not there. Everything suggested father to her. Something would requicken her sorrow. The finding of an old letter, the half-read book with the mark of leaving off, and all those thousand ever-recurring, inconsiderable reminders that keep the heart of sorrow painfully darkened by the shadow of him who has gone; these things lengthened out and intensified the grief till the burden became too hard to bear." For such human agony there is no compensation in the honors and preferments of our life. The current of domestic bliss which once flowed so calmly, reflecting the very heavens on its mirrored bosom, when thus overshadowed—where is the adequate return in the plaudits and honors of men? To wait and wish, and to hear no step, no voice of husband and father; the olden aid which directed, supported, and comforted, gone; gone; no advent to glorify the gloom—this is to the overworn and wearied watcher what mere mechanism of tongue or pen cannot express. Expression only benumbs the soul of such griefs as these. Our tears freeze at the fountain, our sympathies die in the attempt to express them.

History and oratory have been spent in haranguing about the heroes of war. Military genius and renown have been themes of encomium to quicken patriotism and endear private virtues. In the funeral orations over the dead Greeks who fell in fight, Mars alone received apotheosis. We have orations by Pericles, Lysias, and Plato preserved in the crystal beauty of Thucydides. All the muses and graces do obeisance to the solemn rapture of the eloquent hour when in graceful periods and imperishable language the orator came forth from the monument, ascended the tribunal, and, with panegyric beyond the reach of modern art, displayed the virtues of the dead. But these eulogies were in praise only of martial glory. Only once do I recall the words of an inspired Greek, who forgetting for a moment the custom of the time, admonished the people "that the whole earth was the sepulcher of renowned men," whether renowned for honorable exertion in war or peace. It is the old vaunting story of the Bible even: "Saul has slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands." The helmet, the plume, the spear, the sword, the onset—these are the themes of classic funeral eloquence. Men are prone to forget what has been done by the gifted and great whose associations were those of art, literature, benevolence, and science. We seldom remember long those whose lives were rounded with the humility of good deeds and gentle affections. Men rear monuments and arches to the captains of armies, rarely to the leaders of opinion. Few mounds of green turf remain to recall the great thoughts which lived in the heroic lives of such men as Plato, Newton, St. Xavier, Howard, or Cobden. Monuments to military men overshadow the little hillocks on whose breast tears fall and over whose dust blossoms cluster. Rome has her arch to Titus, her column of Trajan. The grave of Agamemnon has been found and glorified by a German scholar; and the exhumed Atridæ are more honored by emperors and kings than the blind bard who sung their praises along the blue Agean.

But, thanks to a better civilization, even the successful general today must have something more than the brute instinct which led Pelissier to smoke the Kabyles in their caves. He must have more than the engineering skill of Todleben and Von Moltke. He must have that knowledge of human nature by which to rule men, not merely in the ranks, but in the senate, in the forum, and among the masses. He must be, as was said of Wellington, something more than a commissary or clerk. He must minister to peaceful states; he must think like lightning, and strike with its vehemence and fatality, for tranquil homes and human happiness in great crises; he must have the gentle amenities of culture along with the heart of the hero. Above all, he must have inwoven like threads of light the patriotic devotion which sees in his country's flag a symbol of order and unity and in his country's civil glory his highest hope and inspiration. The legends and songs, flags and heraldry, with their beasts and boastings, show through all time that prowess in the encounter of body with body is the barbaric yet almost universal code of honor. But when the sword of patriotism is jeweled in the hilt with civil virtues, then a Washington rescues the mere wager by battle from its irrational fame, and gives added glory to the gem and new splendors to the magisterial sword!

May something, sir, be pardoned to the spirit of eulogy, when I say that these elements of true grandeur found a rare combination in MICHAEL C. KERR.

Patient in study, gentle yet firm in his feelings and determinations, inspired with the courage of true patriotism, defying as he did the mob with the same energy with which he analyzed a tariff or denounced an exacting monopoly—arranging, classifying, assimilating details for practical service,—making his conscience his religion—he stands, more than most of the men who have taken part in our councils since the war, as an exemplar of intelligent and fearless, pure and gentle patriotic duty. Yet he was not all judgment, else he would not have been a patriot; he was not all passion, else he would not have been a statesman. In debate, as in private talk, he had at times great vehemence of manner and great intrepidity in action. He did not toss his thoughts about easily; he was at times timid in their utterance till thoroughly assured by patiently marshaling them; and then he was eloquent. Spurning traditions and legends, believing in no law not revocable; not anxious to force men to do what he thought was best for them; with a noble rage at wrong and a disgust of parasites, he would add no largess to bad gains and greeds, any more than he would allow wrong to breed fresh wrong. What were the meshes of old custom to his fresh inquiring mind? While he never turned away from a new truth, while he had no respect for mere antiquity, while he would clear away the lush growth over our select shrines of duty, he revered the ancient ways of the Constitution and all its muniments with the ardor of a neophyte. Sensitive to every point of honor, he was not less careful of his own fame when assailed by perjury than of the financial and patriotic honor of his country.

But, sir, while the contemplation of his character is no compensation for his loss, it is not less instructive than proper for us to know the sources of that magic which won the support of his constituency and the preferments of this Congress. The secret of this talismanic power lay in the discipline of his mind. He was an example, by no means uncommon in this country, of one who was strengthened by wrestling with adversity. The first half of his life was a struggle with poverty, the last with disease. Rising above the trammels of early life he thought more of brain than of brawn. Desiring a larger range of usefulness and ambitions of thorough education, he struggled out of difficulty into a profession where his naturally keen analytic mind had full play. He was not only a good lawyer and advocate, but his mind had a judicial cast, which he would no doubt have illustrated in the chair had he lived, and for which rare trait he was selected as the reporter to the supreme court of Indiana. He believed in settled principles of authority, binding as firmly as the pagan gods were bound by the decree of fate. But while he loved law, he loved liberty. He loved progress, as well as repose. As a Massachusetts scholar has said, "He loved them together," and because, like the nitrogen and oxygen of the atmosphere, they give vitality when combined in proper proportions.

To my mind he does not rate so highly as the lawyer, only because he was more of the scholar and the statesman. His pre-eminence in the last character came from his constant preparation in the first. Every speech of his was a study, a treatise. When he spoke on matters connected with the laws of wealth, trade, and currency, his lucid and cogent style was not more remarkable than his abundant information.

How was this preparation made? He seldom read works of fiction or frivolity. The weightier and more solid authors were to his taste and preference. He never read but one or two novels, and those in the last of his life. George Eliot's Adam Bede attracted him because it endeavored to solve problems of social science. He seldom read poetry, save Homer's Iliad and Milton; though Shakespeare was always near him, and the Bible frequently consulted. In this respect he was not unlike Tristem Burgess, the orator, of Rhode Island. He never intertangled the roses of poetry with the bearded grain of his philosophy. Still he was a great reader of books. His first act when he came to his home from the office was to take up an unfinished book. He left a library of twenty-five hundred volumes, each bought one by one, read, marked, and digested. His library is full of standard works on political economy, to which he always added more, almost until the day of his death.

For a man apparently so uncongenial and cold, the liberalities of his culture, taste, and logic are remarkable. He excluded no volume, however heterodox or orthodox, from his library or his mind. Jefferson was his ideal of a statesman and Webster of an orator; pictures of both hang in his library. His scrap-book was kept for the "best thoughts" of the fathers, as he called them. No ethical or partisan bias controlled his reason. You will see in his library Rénan's Life of Jesus huddling close to McCosh's Evidences of Christianity; Tyndall shakes hands with Paley; Draper's Religion and Science stands by Buckle's History of Civilization; Barnes's Notes keep company with Tom Paine; Jefferson and Madison are almost inbound with Hamilton and Jay; Henry C. Cary lies between Wayland and John Stuart Mill to bridge the abyss between free trade and protection. Of his library, it may be said without exaggeration:

> Here all the rage of controversy ends
> And rival zealots rest like bosom friends;
> Socinians here with Calvinists abide
> And thin partitions angry chiefs divide;
> Here wily Jesuits simple Quakers meet
> And Bellarmin has rest at Luther's feet.

Friends and enemies were alike welcome to his mind, and he tested them all in the crucible of his reason.

Out of this abundant reading he was enabled by his method, his regularity and discipline, to evoke general thoughts for practical life. By his masculine understanding, steady perseverance, and unwearied resolution he rose above illness, professional avocations, and the local demands of his constituency to a higher plane than most statesmen. This element of persistency belonged to his natural traits of character. It was illustrated during his life. It was illustrated in the chair in the struggle with disease, to fill his duty. It was illustrated in the last hours of his tenacious life, for his reason remained unimpaired to the end.

I have said that his reason and conscience were his religion. It was his habit to submit everything to this test. He squared his life with scrupulous reason. No temporal interest of his own or that of his family swerved him from following this guiding element of his character.

He was a scholar; he was a disciple of the positive philosophy, devoted to the tenets of Herbert Spencer, John Stuart Mill, Compte, and Buckle. His political science was drawn, as most political science is, from those of similar philosophic inclinations. Jeremy Bentham was his teacher, consciously or unconsciously. His ideas were not transcendental, but utilitarian. The bent of his mind was increased by his studies in this school of philosophy, but there was no unreasoning skepticism in his character.

Despite his unwillingness to believe in anything miraculous or improbable, his heart was reverential before the great Omniscience. With him reason was the first born, and, though twin with faith, both inherited the blessing. If he had any bias in his mind it was toward reason, though his faith walked timidly hand in hand with it. It is said that the sun is reason, while faith is the lesser orb that shines by night; MICHAEL C. KERR made the great light to rule his busy day. How far the lesser ruled in the contemplations of the night only God knows. If faith shines only so long as she reflects some faint illumination from the brighter orb what casuistry shall discard this man's religious nature from the shrine of a true religion.

It is not necessary to renew the scenes of his death-bed here and now. Only this may be said, from competent medical authority, that rarely has one of our race been gifted with such a tenacity of life. He lived after his pulse ceased to beat. This fact may serve somewhat to account for the positiveness of his purposes in life and the positive philosophy to which his intellect inclined.

He was a democrat on principles fixed by his studies and philosophy, I was about to say, by his religion. Yet (as has been truly said) he was averse to the rough encounters of the hustings. It was difficult to induce him to speak outside of his neighborhood. Once in New York he promised to talk for five minutes to my friends, but when on his feet, and with an audience sympathizing with his free-trade ideas, he held the audience for two hours in one great plea for his favorite liberalities of commerce, and against the mercenary inequalities of protection. These were his favorite themes to illustrate his general political ideas. They were to him an enthusiastic sentiment—his principle of action. He traveled abroad to study them. He came to Congress to give them vigor and effect.

He was averse to the crowd. When writing to him about my pro tempore visit to the great exposition, he expressed his regret that he did not see the grand engine and its wonderful ramifications of harnessed forces; but at the same time he said that he shrank from such throngs like the sensitive plant before the human touch. Yet his political thoughts were ever "broad, based upon the people's will." His dissection of the questions growing out of reconstruction and the southern ballot, which had been to him a special study, show the ultimate scorn of a mind utterly hating fraud, and the lofty patriot who reverenced all sections and respected all rights. It is said that the spectroscope reveals that there is a star which burns gold for its illumination. By a wonderful coincidence it is the distant star Aldebaran—far off in the group of Hyades—which the Rosicrucians, who sought to transmute all metals into gold, worshiped. That star was their fateful genius for inspiration and alchemy. Not less precious to him, than if it were a star of gold, was each State, distinct in individuality and like to each other in a common right, interest, and destiny, whether shining near or afar!

O, that God would raise up for our instruction and guidance other men of the same exalted type of American manhood—men as just, other haters of corruption as earnest, other tribunes of the people as peerless and fearless, and other statesmen as lofty and pure in patriotic devotion! When, sir, I perceive the emblem of mourning over the seat he so lately occupied, shrouding our ensign, the omen is sadly portentous and painfully suggestive. Were he with us in this hour of our solicitude I know, sir, that he would not fail with courageous counsel. He would revive the heroism of that parliamentary band, before which royal prerogatives cowered—when before the privilege of the Commons and its staunch Speakers, the bills of right of a free people were made paramount to the thunders of the throne!

His fame was not quenched by death, only his opportunity. It was said by Theodore Parker, of Samuel Adams, that he was not in one sense a Christian man, but one of Plutarch's men. So was MICHAEL C. KERR. His human worth can only be reckoned by the gravity of his loss to us, in this perilous and anxious trial for the stability and genius of the Government. If liberty through his death has lost from this Hall of the people one of her purest devotees; if liberty, like Algernon Sydney, must go to the scaffold, yet from the scaffold she will ascend to another sphere where there is a better code of justice and right; and there in that realm, who will give her less stinted and more welcome than the immortal spirit of MICHAEL C. KERR.

Under such patriotic thoughts as were his, still surviving death, our country may cease from its passionate discord. Then peace will bind our States as sheaves are bound in the harvesting, season after season, till the latest generation. You, Mr. Speaker, and ye who are your brothers in these exalted trusts, ye who have the keeping of this bruised and broken land, can ye not all rise under the admonition of such a life as our late Speaker lived, into a higher sense of duty and a more self-sacrificing patriotism? Can we not encompass our beloved land around with a wall of fire that will not burn, but guard? Shall we not do this before its grave yawns; that grave where there is no work, nor knowledge, nor device, nor wisdom? Thus faithful unto death in our trusts, as he was, may we not have the promise of a crown of everlasting life which I trust in God he wears. [Applause on floor and galleries.]

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, this Congress, from the hour of its meeting in December, 1875, until the day of its adjournment in August, 1876, stood in the shadow of an impending calamity! A Speaker was elected who, by reason of his long service, his large experience, and pre-eminent ability, was deemed worthy of the exalted station. He brought to the discharge of its duties a clear head, a sound heart, an impartial judgment, and a resolute will; but, sir, it was painfully evident to every one that a mortal and fast-consuming malady had possession of him. In the very hour of his triumph, when he had scaled the heights and reached the goal of his ambition; when there lay before bright prospects of future usefulness and still higher honor; when he had a right to feel that he was about to enjoy the full fruition of a laborious and well-spent life, he was summoned to the dread conflict with the last enemy, one in which we must all engage and in which no mortal may triumph. For days and weeks and months we stood sad and helpless spectators of the fierce struggle. We well knew it to be hopeless, and our sorrow was scarcely lessened by our admiration for the heroic courage, the sublime fortitude, the dauntless spirit with which he marched forth to meet and embrace death.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune, as it was yours and that of others who hear me, to have served with him in former days, when he stood upon this floor the peer of any one in intellect and ability; and therefore I leave it to those who have personal knowledge to speak of his merits and services as a legislator and statesman. My personal acquaintance with him began with the first session of this Congress. Under ordinary circumstances it would necessarily have been slight, but painful events, fresh in the recollection of all of us and of the whole country, placed me in such relations to him as to render it almost a duty, as it is a mournful satisfaction, to put on record my estimate of his character as a man.

After years of public service, here and elsewhere, he stood at the threshold of the grave, comparatively poor in this world's goods, and, to his great honor be it spoken, rich in nothing save his good name, his character for spotless integrity, his unblemished reputation for purity in public and private life. These were his jewels; these were the treasures which he had garnered; these he valued more than houses and lands or all mere earthly possessions. But, sir, when weak and worn by disease, when even hope had fled, when the dark shadows of death were closing about him, a base and cowardly attempt was made to rob him of his good name and send him to his grave disgraced and dishonored. It became my painful duty to inform him of the nature of the charge preferred against him. He met it with a philosophic composure and stern defiance which told of his conscious innocence. Courting the most searching investigation, he demanded to meet his base accuser face to face. For long and weary days the investigation proceeded. I will not attempt to describe the proud and defiant spirit with which he met and braved the terrible ordeal. So broken and disabled in body those who knew him best had grave fears that death would seal his lips before he could make reply; but the very exigency seemed to rekindle and vivify his expiring energies, to endow him with new and almost superhuman power. To him it was a struggle more grave and terrible than that which he had been making for prolonged existence: it was for untarnished reputation, for unsullied honor. To the dying man these were dearer and far more precious than mere existence, for without them it would have been a curse. The hour of his triumphant vindication came, when in this Chamber each representative of the American people then present rose solemnly in his place and declared his profound conviction of his purity and innocence. Thus the dark cloud which threatened to obscure the brightness of his setting sun was rolled away, and a blessed peace, a serene tranquility came to the great heart of the dying Speaker.

I may not lift the veil which rightfully separates his inner and private from his outer and public life, but it would be unjust to his memory did I fail to record his lively sense of this crowning act of kindness and justice on the part of those whose good opinion was so dear to him. To his sensitive and dying ear it told of the verdict which after-times would render. It brought profound consolation to him, and thereafter he was fully prepared to say "Nunc dimittis."

His was a proud, sensitive, and imperious nature, ever shrinking from familiarity with the world, asking little of its sympathy and caring less for its applause. He chose to be judged by his acts rather than by professions. His convictions were deep and decided upon all questions, and he did not hesitate to obey and follow them to their ultimate and logical results. He controlled and led his fellow-men by the sheer force of his intellect rather than by the influence of his heart. He was always a teacher, a leader; never an imitator or servile follower. In any era of our history he would have been a character of mark, his moral courage and his mental powers alike fitting him for the performance of duties of gravest moment. His death would have been a great public loss at any time; in this hour of doubt, uncertainty, and danger, it is next to irreparable, when we consider the character of the man, the dignity and power of his place, the hold he had upon the confidence of the people and the stern and unyielding fidelity with which he would have dared to perform his whole duty.

To-day, Indiana stands chief mourner for the son of her adoption, MICHAEL C. KERR; close and next by her side stands Pennsylvania, on whose soil he was born and partly reared. She claims a sister's sacred right to mourn the loss of an honored child. My poor and broken utterances but feebly express her estimate of his worth, her profound regard for his memory!

Mr. MCCRARY. I esteem it a privilege as well as a duty to offer on this occasion my humble tribute to the memory of our late lamented Speaker. I do so not as a mere empty ceremony, but prompted by a profound respect for the great qualities of mind and heart which adorned his life, which sustained him in sickness and in death, and the memory of which will live long in the history of his country and in the hearts of his countrymen. I desire to speak a few words in remembrance of his virtues in this place, which was the scene of so much of his public career, and on this day, which our records are to dedicate sacredly to his memory, because I knew him well and esteemed and honored him in life, while I deeply and earnestly lament his death. My personal acquaintance with Mr. KERR began in the Forty-first Congress, in which we served together on the Committee of Elections, and although it never ripened into confidential intimacy it was of that kind which enabled me, as I think, to form a just estimate of his character. His active participation in the proceedings of Congress, his prominent position among the leaders of his party, his fearless, bold, and outspoken action upon all public questions, brought him prominently before the House and the country, and his associates upon this floor, whether personally intimate with him or not, could not fail to know him as a Representative, to appreciate him as a man, and to realize his great power. He was a man of commanding ability. Toward the close of his life his powers were of course in some degree impaired by disease; and yet we all know how remarkably clear and vigorous were all his rulings as Speaker as well as his statement of the ground upon which he placed them. When in the full vigor of health, he was seldom matched and I think never overmatched in debate upon this floor. He was a careful student and thinker and though he spoke frequently it was never at random, but he always uttered what had been carefully matured and settled in his own mind. He was a profound lawyer, and in his own State as well as elsewhere he stood very high in the ranks of his profession. He was a man of intense convictions and always uttered what he thoroughly believed to be true and defended what he thoroughly believed to be right, while his denunciation of what he deemed false and wrong was always earnest and vigorous. To these rare qualities he added thorough honesty and the utmost purity of life in all its relations, whether public or private. I may not from personal knowledge speak of the beauty and sweetness of his home-life and of his purely private and domestic relations, but these have been since his death, as they were in his life, the theme upon which those who were very near to him have most loved to dwell.

It is praise, indeed, to say of one departed, "he was a good husband, a good father, and a good citizen," and when we may add "he was a true patriot, an able and faithful public servant, and a wise and sagacious statesman," the eulogy is complete. As a presiding officer our late Speaker was a model of dignity, urbanity, and impartiality. His course while in the chair was such as not only to command the respect but also to win the esteem and confidence of his political opponents, as well as his party associates. I take this occasion to bear willing and emphatic testimony to this fact. I refer to it with great pleasure because in it I find an illustration of that devotion to duty and faithfulness to public trust which distinguished him and which must characterize the life of every really great man. Here is to be found one of the surest tests by which to discover a really lofty character. When such a character is called to a position where he is to decide questions arising between his fellow-men, he is sure to rise above every consideration except those which concern justice and the law. Mr. KERR was an active participant in many exciting partisan contests upon this floor during his service here, and few men ever defended in debate their party or its principles with greater zeal and ability; but as Speaker he seemed to know no party. He took his great office with a firm resolve to administer it with perfect fidelity, to be absolutely faithful and just, and he kept that purpose to the end.

I speak thus of the deceased Speaker with all the more pleasure because, while we were personal friends, we were political opponents, and I feel that on that account my poor words of eulogy would be very grateful to him if he could hear them, and that they may be a source of consolation to the bereaved ones he has left behind. It is according to the genius of our institutions that political differences should never engender personal animosities. The right of private judgment and of free speech is a right so sacred, and belongs so sacredly to all, that we are bound to recognize it and respect it in our opponents if we would preserve it for ourselves. The great American principle of toleration lies at the foundation of our civil as well as our religious liberty; and that principle is obeyed in its true spirit only by those who have learned, not merely to tolerate an opponent, but to honor and respect an honest and manly adversary. Such an adversary was MICHAEL C. KERR; and as it was my pleasure while he lived upon all proper occasions to bear testimony to his exalted character, it is still my pleasure, now that he has passed on into that higher and better life, to speak in praise of his many virtues and in honor of his memory.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, at this stage of these memorial ceremonies I consult the emotions of my heart rather than the dictates of my judgment in attempting to speak on this mournful occasion.

The fame and popularity of the distinguished dead, in the State of Tennessee, makes it meet that some one of her Representatives should pay a sincere tribute of respect to the memory of one who so largely commanded her admiration and esteem.

Truly Tennessee gives utterance of her sorrow and sympathy with Indiana who keeps vestal watch over the honor of one of her favorite and most distinguished sons, and would remind her that she, too, yea, that a nation, claims the patrimony of his fame and in his death shares the spoliation and the loss.

This mute assemblage, these gloomy faces, these pendant trappings of national sorrow, bespeak a more than ordinary occasion of sadness. It is the heartfelt lamentation of the American people, through their Representatives, over the loss of a wise statesman, a pure patriot, and an honest man; while it is a proper manifestation of the personal grief, mellowed a little by time, which pervades this entire Hall over this unusual if not altogether unprecedented bereavement, in the death of its presiding officer.

Already have we gazed with intense admiration upon the living portrait of this truly noble man, as it has been faithfully drawn to-day by his colleagues and peers. Starting with the first buddings of character in infancy amid the sports and freaks of childhood until ripe and stronger traits unfolded themselves, hardened by the iron touch of poverty, when at length he boldly entered the emulous walks of a self-reliant manhood; winning this trophy, bearing off that honor, gaining this triumph, all the time assuming responsibilities and enlarging the scope of his duties and deepening the foundations of his popularity by the most devoted consecration to the public interests, until finally he aspired to the exalted and distinguished office of Speaker of this House, and was fortunate enough to have the aspiration of his noble ambition crowned with brilliant success.

It is reserved, however, for the hand of affection to trace and gather up the incidents and events of his inward life and domestic feelings, which, inseparably interwoven, form the woof of his private history. These all will be laid away as golden treasures in memory's casket, which only is in the keeping of domestic love and filial devotion never again to meet with the world's harsh encounter. These tender associations let us leave inurned within the sacred chambers of inconsolable private grief; but of his outward life and public services we may speak, for they belong to the country and to society.

Nor can we fairly forecast his true character even as a public man without analyzing in some degree his elementary characteristics.

Indomitable energy and unflagging perseverance, linked with an earnestness born of deep and abiding conviction, marked all of his efforts and enabled him almost invariably to succeed in whatever he undertook. With him action always followed conviction. Sprung from the ranks of the people, all of his sympathies and principles were in accord with them. He was truly a tribune of the people. Although devoted to party organization he never surrendered or sacrificed to partisan advantage any real or substantive right which belonged alike to all. He was a partisan, but his partisanship was used as a means for the accomplishment of just public undertakings, and not as an end in the abstract. Watching his career as a public man, he impressed me as an honest inquirer after truth. He had a simple, child-like faith in its omnipotence, and wherever its clarion notes sounded thitherward he bent his steps, and there planted the standard of his unswerving fealty. Of course he could not be other than reliable, conscientious, and consistent. His character panoplied with these noble principles, it was not astonishing that public sentiment of all parties, recently, should have rushed to his rescue, to ward off the poisoned javelins of calumny and detraction, before even the courts of justice or a committee of Congress were enabled to pronounce the decree of his complete vindication. His mind turned with instinctive horror from every appearance of indirection, deceit, or dishonorable action, sustaining with true courage whatever he believed to be right and opposing with his whole nature what he conceived to be wrong. Like Burke, he believed bad men capable of doing any evil, however dark and wicked; hence he had no intimate associations or personal relations only as acquaintance and time developed the character and justified the friendship. As a consequence his personal friendships were limited, strong, unchangeable, and unsuspecting. Such a man was worthy of being the leader of the people as he was unquestionably their advocate and defender. He did not feel that his official duties, exalted, responsible, and honorable as they were, made him an irresponsible ruler or constituted in him any superiority to his constituency. He ever bowed with graceful and patriotic submission to the adverse will of the majority when constitutionally expressed. These attachments to popular rights and his unfeigned profession of political faith and doctrine created within his manly bosom the broadest and profoundest love of country.

No statesman knew better than he the true nature of our Government, the genius of our free institutions, our past history, foreign and domestic relations, and the real temper and interests of the people. No one knew better than he that the truest and most steadfast friends of liberty are a frugal, intelligent, and virtuous rural population. No one knew better than he from the pages of history that avarice, vice, and national vanity, when once allowed to obtain a hold upon the rulers of a nation, smother the love of country and drive out those simple, manly virtues in the people, by long accustoming them to acts of usurpation and doubtful authority, until they finally cease to care to what power they owe allegiance—by what they are governed. These dangerous and insidious inroads, gradually made upon the rights of the masses and which so often have befallen free governments and caused their overthrow, ever caught the fire of his jealous eye and encountered in their incipiency the whole weight of his uncompromising opposition.

> And thou in this shalt find thy monument,
> When tyrant's crests and tombs of brass are spent.

Clothed with the delicate trust by party suffrage of exercising magisterial authority over the Representatives of all the people, he never forgot that he best vindicated the honor and dignity of his high position by observing the utmost fairness in his rulings and maintaining toward all, without regard to partisan distinctions, perfect impartiality.

As the mother of the Gracchi, when asked for her jewels, pointed to her sons, so do a free constituency regard the representative whose private life presents a stainless escutcheon, while the mirror of his public record reflects only the images of truth, virtue, and patriotism.

While this matter-of-fact world excludes even the contemplation of the ideal and counts nothing worth save the practical and the true, yet where in all the land whose reputation of all of our public men for the last quarter of a century would furnish the artist a truer model or the poet a more perfect ideal of human virtue and worth than the moral and mental traits which made up the manly and noble character of MICHAEL C. KERR?

Alas! he has passed away, but his name is one of the household words of this Hall of Representatives, and will live with the truest and noblest who have worn its chief honors.

> To live with fame
> The gods allow to many, but to die
> With equal luster, is a blessing Heaven
> Selects from all her choicest boons of Fate,
> And with a sparing hand, on few bestows.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, if I had consulted my own wishes and inclinations I should have been silent during the present sad hour; but having been requested to join in the ceremonies of the occasion, with sadness of heart and trembling hand I lay my wreath upon his bier, humble though it be.

I feel proud to be able to class myself as one of the earliest and warmest friends of the deceased; not only his friend, but advisor. For several years we served together in this House; during that time I watched his career; each day he grew upon me; not only so, but he grew upon the country until he was called to fill yonder chair, now draped in mourning. He became the Speaker of the Forty-fourth Congress, filling, and filling worthily, the position held by such men as Muhlenberg, Clay, Stevenson, Polk, Winthrop, Linn Boyd, and BANKS.

MICHAEL C. KERR illustrated in his own person one of the excellences of our form of government, the possibility, right, and power of any of its citizens to fill its highest, most honorable, and most responsible positions, provided he deserved them, deserved them by his ability, energy, and integrity. He was pre-eminently the architect of his own fortune. He had not the adventitious aid of family or fortune.

But unaided and alone he climbed the ladder of fame until he had almost reached its topmost round. It may be truthfully said of him as was said of Aristides and Cato, "that he advanced himself to great honor and dignity in the commonwealth by no other means than his own virtue and industry." The young men of our country have in him a bright examplar to cheer them on in their lonely struggles for place and position, and I only hope that like him they may never swerve from the path of high honor and unyielding integrity. In all his congressional career he labored most assiduously for his country and the Constitution; truly could he adopt the language that Plutarch applied to himself: "This service, I say, is not for myself; it is for my country. Among all his colleagues on this floor I knew no one who more fixedly and constantly made the Constitution his polar star. He kept his eye steadily upon it. When any question arose in our deliberations upon which he was called to act, the first question he propounded to himself was "Is this measure constitutional?" If not, he opposed it.

With that as his chart and compass he felt confident of guiding the great ship of state safely through all storms, however high the billows might rise or however black and angry the clouds might become. He had a living and abiding faith that the billows would subside, the clouds pass away, the stars again shine out brightly, the night pass away, and the sun of the morrow rise brightly upon the vessel and its noble crew.

I never knew a man who had stronger convictions and clearer conceptions, and these convictions he followed most scrupulously to their logical results without turning to the right or left, or stopping to see the result. The sordid, selfish arts of the demagogue or political trickster he utterly loathed. He adopted as his guide the following language of Aristotle: "Popular governments in which the constitution and laws are supreme afford no place for demagogues. Where, however, the laws are not sovereign, demagogues spring up." O, that in this centennial period, this our hour of peril, these lines and this sentiment were emblazoned upon the dome of this Capitol, written in letters of living light over the Speaker's chair, upon every public building and private house throughout our broad, beloved, and distracted land. I know of no public man of his day who more thoroughly demonstrated in his public life the sentiment of William Pitt, the Great Commoner of England, when he said: "I will not go to court if I may not bring the constitution with me."

As a debater he had few equals on this floor or elsewhere; clear, concise, and logical, as a steady opponent of jobs, rings, subsidies, and partial legislation he yielded to no one. Who of all his colleagues does not not recall that clear, ringing voice of his in clarion tones denouncing what he deemed corrupt and pernicious legislation? As a presiding officer, though emaciated and feeble physically, he gave evidence of being equal to any who had preceded him, always commanding the high respect, confidence, and admiration of the whole House irrespective of party.

He had the high purpose, the firm resolve, and dauntless courage of a statesman of the highest order. With him the blandishments of power had no influence; he yielded neither to its behests nor was allured by its trappings. While he had the very highest respect for the voice of the people constitutionally expressed, he heeded not the frowns of the infuriated mob goaded on by designing demagogues. He never crooked "the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning."

His aims were unselfish, his hands were clean, his life was pure and full of the tenderest affection for a noble and loving wife and a fond and obedient son.

But he is no more. He has been called to his long home. His labors on earth are closed. His voice will no more be heard in these Halls. His last remains lie buried beneath the soil of his adopted State, Indiana. No more shall we meet his tall, manly form and be permitted to grasp his unsoiled hand. He will no more go in and out before us. But may we all meet him again in that better land, on that "great day for which all other days were made, for which earth sprang from chaos, man from earth, and God from eternity."

Mr. KNOTT. It may be considered a work of supererogation on my part, Mr. Speaker, to offer a single remark in addition to what has already been so eloquently said by other gentlemen on the present melancholy occasion, yet there are certain circumstances which will perhaps excuse me, if indeed they do not render it peculiarly appropriate that I should beg the brief indulgence of the House at this time, not for the vain purpose of attempting to express my own private grief for the death of our lamented Speaker—for at the tomb of a loved and honored friend the anguish of genuine friendship can find no voice—but that I may contribute my assistance, feeble as it may be, in crystallizing in the history of the country to whose service he dedicated the best years of his life some of the evidences of his merits derived from long and intimate personal association.

It was in the midst of one of the most refined and cultivated communities in the district I now have the honor to represent upon this floor that Mr. KERR first stepped upon the arena of active manhood. It was at the beautiful little town of Bloomfield, in the State of Kentucky, that he laid the foundation of his subsequent career of usefulness and honor while engaged as a faithful, earnest, and efficient instructor of youth. There in the intervals of his arduous duties as a teacher, which others might have devoted to idleness and pleasure, he mastered the fundamental principles of jurisprudence and political philosophy with which in after life, both as a lawyer and a statesman, he showed himself so remarkably familiar. There his indefatigable energy, his indomitable will, his unwearying industry, and, above all, his immaculate integrity are still held up for the emulation of the aspiring youth who in the face of penury and misfortune would achieve an honorable distinction among his fellowmen. There those striking traits of a manly character which distinguished him through life, and which have already been so happily portrayed by the eloquent gentlemen who have preceded me, won for him the confidence, the respect, and the affections of a large circle of warm-hearted, generous friends, who, sympathizing in all his laudable aspirations and proud of his well-earned success, delighted to do him honor when he had struggled far up the rugged steeps of a justly merited fame.

Of his early friends at Bloomfield he delighted to speak in terms of the most affectionate remembrance and I have heard him frequently remark that the happiest, proudest moment of his life was when they welcomed him back in their midst after years of absence, to a grand ovation to which they had invited him just after his last election to Congress.

My own personal acquaintance with Mr. KERR began in July, 1867, when I met him for the first time on the floor of this House, as a member of the Fortieth Congress. A variety of circumstances soon brought us into frequent, intimate, and confidential intercourse with each other, and afforded me the most favorable opportunities of becoming familiarly acquainted with one of the most admirable characters with which I have ever come in contact; a character which perhaps but few have ever fully appreciated in all its excellence, because but few have studied it from the same stand-point and under similar circumstances to those I was so fortunate as to enjoy.

The most remarkable trait in that character, indeed the key to Mr. KERR's whole life, public and private, was his unswerving, unfaltering, inflexible fealty to Truth under all circumstances and upon all occasions whatever. In the light of that single fact, every act and utterance of his public and private career should be viewed. It was this that led him to act in everything upon the maxim of Aristotle, that incredulity is the source of all wisdom—to take nothing for granted, but to satisfy himself by actual investigation of the real foundation as well as the ultimate conclusion of every proposition upon whatever subject that might be submitted to his mind. Hence resulted those habits of indefatigable labor, careful analysis, patient research, profound meditation, and deliberate utterance, for which he was so distinguished. It was this same devotion to the truth as he understood it that gave him the reputation among some who had not made a careful analysis of his character, of being unduly obstinate in the maintenance of his own opinions. His was truly a firmness that would have led him to a martyr's stake; but it was a firmness resulting from a conviction of duty and not from any mere false pride of opinion. It was this same fealty to truth that made him the very impersonation of personal honor and official integrity. Slow, and at times apparently timid in arriving at his conclusions, reaching them usually after patient and laborious investigation, and ever impelled by an inexorable sense of duty, none of the blandishments of flattery, no allurement of place, or power, or fame, no threat of defeat or unpopularity, no influence of mere private friendship could swerve him a hair's breadth from the right as he understood it, or deter him from the honest outspoken expression of his own fixed opinions. There was but one possible way to move him, and that was to convince him of his error, and when convinced no one was ever more ready to confess or retract his mistake. It was this same fidelity to truth which infused into his oratory that peculiar fervor and energy of expression which frequently characterized it, not only in stating his deliberately conceived opinions, but when indulging, as he sometimes did, in flashes of fierce invective when his indignation was aroused by the detection of falsehood or hypocrisy, for whatever was false, or fraudulent, or in any wise deceptive, his innate love of truth led him to despise with an intensity almost beyond the reach of expression. And finally, sir, it was owing to his fealty to truth that some were led into the strangest of all possible misconceptions of his character. There were those who regarded him as a singularly cold, unfriendly man, while the truth was a truer, warmer, tenderer heart, or one more loyal to its friends never beat in human bosom. He scorned, from the very depths of his soul, the arts of flattery and dissimulation, and had the manly courage, so rare, so difficult to find, to remind his friends plainly, candidly, and truthfully of their faults.

But, sir, I will not abuse your patience by a further analysis of the character of our dead Speaker. It stands out amid those of his compeers, a Doric column, symmetrical in its solidity, beautiful in the utter absence of all meretricious ornament, and immaculate in the material of which it was reared. Few like it illustrate the annals of our race.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in rising to-day to give utterance to my feelings of personal bereavement, I feel—as one does not often feel on occasions of this character—that the loss of one is the loss of all. In giving this feeble token of my grief that we no longer have MICHAEL C. KERR of Indiana in our midst, I but utter what every patriotic citizen of his State and our country must feel: that our grief is no common grief; our loss, no common loss; and that it will be long ere the void made by the death of our lamented Speaker will again be filled by such a man as he. When a man by the resolute force of his own invincible character attains exalted station, and is charged with the performance of important public functions—and that, too, at a time when circumstances seem such that considerations of party fealty are likely to determine the choice in favor of those who have earned recognition by partisan services, rather than that the prize should be adjudged to unostentatious merit—his removal by the hand of death is a circumstance so unfortunate as to arouse the sympathies of even the hardest of hearts. To be denied the light of his counsel and the encouragement of his voice is a deprivation of no ordinary magnitude; a national calamity that all must deplore.

Although my acquaintance with the late Speaker was formed during the latter years of his life, yet familiarity with his many excellent qualities depended not upon the length of time one was thrown in contact with him. To appreciate the manly, genial, and conciliatory turn of his mind, one has but to glance at his conduct during the organization of the present House; to know his worth and truly appreciate the most exalted phases of his character, one should be of the number of those who originally had some other preference for the Speakership. But from whatever stand-point one studies him, whether as a supporter or as an opponent, the honest observer must acknowledge the stability and rectitude of his character, the firmness of his purpose, and the geniality of his heart. The trying flame of physical suffering only seemed to bring forth more brilliantly the golden treasures of his judgment. With a rich and varied experience such as seems essential for a truthful knowledge of human nature, he was placed in the Speaker's chair at a time when his public career was seemingly opening before him a wide field of usefulness. The sad story of his physical decline and untimely death are written in indelible characters in the hearts of every one who during the last session saw the almost superhuman exertions he made to appear in the chair of the House and perform his trying duties—duties that, had he been in ordinary health, would have weighed upon him as a straw upon the arm of a giant.

Who, were the power granted him, would willingly enter into the secret thoughts of the strong man, struck with mortal disease, conscious of his infirmity, aware of its nature, and knowing only too well its inevitable end? The evils of life tell all of us that there are callings among the occupations of men which bring those who assume their duties into contact with sickness and distress, to whom such sad stories are among the daily incidents of life. A cultivated mind, and the consciousness of ability to mitigate suffering and alleviate anxiety, may be some compensation for the strain to which human feeling is subjected; but who, I again ask, not of those professions, would willingly enter into the secret thoughts of one conscious of his rapidly approaching end, and share with the sufferer the terrible distress which must arise when he sees the dark, unknown future rapidly drawing upon him, soon doomed to separate him from the present, with all its cares, all its responsibilities? To one in robust health the thought even is replete with pain. How great, then, must have been the fortitude, the power of resisting suffering, and the ability to banish thought of self in our late Speaker during all those long, weary days when, borne down by disease and racked with pain, he still persisted in performing the duties of his office? Nothing but an abiding sense of the importance of the task devolved upon him, and a deep consciousness that it was better for him to persevere and die in performance of his duty, rather than shrink from its execution, kept him at his post at a time when all were conscious that he was wearing away his life. At a time and under circumstances when almost any other man would have dismissed thought of public cares from his mind and devoted attention to himself, Mr. KERR knew no other course than that which inspired him to let all else go, and abide by the demands of that country to whose service he had already devoted many of the best years of his life. The result we all know. Many men have fallen martyrs on the field of battle. To MICHAEL C. KERR it was reserved to offer his life and his all on the altar of his country, unanimated by the clamor of contest or the shock of battle—a martyr to conviction—one who died for his country in giving her those services she stood so much in need of.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, is absent by order of the House, but has left in manuscript remarks which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD as part of this day's proceedings.

There was no objection. The following are the remarks prepared by Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the voice of Missouri ought not to be silent on an occasion like this. As a part of the Louisiana Territory acquired from France, Missouri was first under the pupilage of Governor Harrison, of Indiana. The civil polity of her local institutions was thus impressed upon the very childhood of Missouri. Her brave and hardy yeomanry came with those of Kentucky as the pioneers who penetrated the wilds of the western bank of the Mississippi and hushed the shout of the red man, felled the forests, and blazed out the pathways for the coming legions of civilization. Allied by history and tradition, recounting the perils, privations, and achievements of a common ancestry, when Indiana presented the name of her distinguished citizen for the Speakership of this Congress Missouri had neither prejudice nor jealousy to overcome in yielding him her support. She has cause to mourn his loss, and lays claim to a share in the glory of his name and fame as a part of her rightful heritage.

It is no purpose or province of mine to review his life. That office belongs to those who knew him best. Nor shall I offend his memory by fulsome eulogy. Nothing could have been more distasteful to him when living. "Paint me as I am," said Oliver Cromwell, while sitting to young Lely. "If you leave out the scars and wrinkles I will not pay you a shilling." Such would be the request of Mr. KERR, could he now speak to us.

He was always averse to display. He despised shams of all sorts. His character was real. Mere idealism and speculation found no place in a mind occupied and surcharged with the realities of actual life. Rugged in thought and severe in habit, the world regarded him as austere and cold. Drawn into that isolation often unavoidable to the professional man and close student, he was esteemed unsocial.

He was eminently a man of convictions. He had no model. He investigated and thought for himself. He hung not in the midair of hesitancy or doubt, but always reached a conclusion. He grappled with his subject and mastered it. Hence his convictions were not visionary or momentary. They were of the conscience acting through the judgment, and were abiding. He never yielded a principle for mere expediency. He never abandoned the right for success. He did not believe with Shakespeare in applying "craft against vice;" but he believed rather with Hobbes, that craft is "crooked wisdom; a sign of pusillanimity." Mere policy in affairs of state he regarded as too often the abandonment of the field of justice and patriotism for a triumph empty and short-lived. He carried no concealed dagger, and while he courted no unnecessary contests he shrank not from the open field and an equal sword.

During the heated discussion had on this floor last session over the question of the surrender of Hallet Kilbourn to the District court, I met Speaker KERR near the door to the left of his chair and said to him: "What do you think of the policy of sending Kilbourn to the court and leaving the responsibility of the judgment of the court with the republican party?" With nervous emphasis he instantly replied: "It will not do at all. This matter involves one of the important constitutional prerogatives of this House. To yield it would be to place ourselves in the just contempt of the country and to confess our imbecility."

We are told by naturalists that birds of paradise fly swiftest against the wind. While the contrary winds serve to display the brightness of their plumage, in drifting behind them their gorgeous train of feathers, they gather strength as their flight is entangled with the gale. So, with some men, the stormy day is better for their mental qualities than the calm. Mr. KERR'S congressional career was amid scenes of almost revolutionary excitement; when political virtue and constitutional principles were subjected to unexampled tests. It was a time that tried men's souls, and how few withstood the test! It was the development of Mr. KERR. It aroused the latent fires of his soul, and with undaunted courage he stood in the forefront of the battle for constitutional liberty which he conceived to be imperiled. On the ramparts of the Constitution he stood the sleepless, intrepid sentinel. Like the chivalric Henry V on the field of Agincourt, charging the chafing, desperate Duke of Alençon, he led the serried little band on this side of the House with a skill and courage that extorted applause from even those who were impaled by his unyielding lance.

Mr. Speaker, the true heroes of this world are not always recognized. The devotion of the deluded fakirs as they mangle their bodies and practice all manner of austerities, the reckless daring of the fireman, the animal courage of the soldier, fail not to win the applause of the common herd of men. But there is a moral heroism of man in adhering to duty and the right, in breasting the storm of popular opinion under circumstances of intimidation and temptation, of which the world takes little note, but is as grand and glorious as martyrdom itself. In these days of moral cowardice, of mock joustings and tourney-loving masses of political hacks; of the men "of mint and anise and cummin;" of empiricism and social and political shoddyism, when counterfeit pretension passes for the pure coin of solid merit and brazen impudence challenges public confidence, and admiration even, such men as MICHAEL C. KERR, who lifted against these tawdry trappings of a vicious age the blazing buckler of a more heroic epoch, are a nation's glory and the people's hope.

He was not what the world commonly calls a genius. But if genius be defined the faculty of appreciation, he has claims to the coveted gift. He certainly appreciated "the eternal fitness of things." He spoke without ornamentation, directly to the pending issue, with a depth of earnestness and stress of emphasis that convinced if it did not charm. He seems to have adopted the motto of Somers, "Prodesse quam conspici." He never dropped the iron links of argument for the gossamer threads of rhetoric. If he failed in the glamour of an exuberant fancy, or seldom touched the deeper chords of impassioned eloquence, he at times glowed like the furnace in which the richer material is separated from the dross and better fitted for the uses of the world. If he was imperious in opinion, he was not an unreasoning dogmatist. If he was austere in manner and reserved in intercourse, he was no demagogue nor fawning sycophant. Idiosyncrasies and prejudices he may have had, but he never betrayed a trust, deceived or deserted a friend.

Mr. KERR was a man of inexorable honesty. His active public life lay through a period of excessive vice, of shameless profligacy, and unblushing corruption; yet perhaps no man living or dead kept his official garments purer. No stain is on them. No unclean thing ever touched his ermine. No serpent's trail crossed his path. No cloud of dishonor shadows his grave.

When amid the season just passed, of intense party rancor, there were found those who dared attempt to asperse the unsullied name of this exalted citizen, the instinctive chivalry of the whole American people rebelled against the foul imputation. It was during this saddest hour of the night of his life I saw him most and learned the stuff he was made of. Prior to this his friends saw the danger to his life by his continued labor in the public service; but he seemed to have adopted the sentiment of the Roman patriot, Necesse ut eam non ut vivam. When his integrity was assailed his determination was fixed to die with his harness on.

What a spectacle that was! Disease had marked him as a victim and had him in its toils. The angel of death had kissed his wan cheeks and left the hectic flush there. The voice, one utterance of which was once a command to silence and attention to listening Congresses and multitudes, was broken and gone. His palsied limbs refused longer to bear the burden of even his emaciated body. He was almost a disembodied spirit. There was left to him his indomitable will which seemed to refuse submission to the dominion of death. Sensible of his danger, and sensitive of his honor—the best legacy he had to bequeath to wife and child—yet conscious of his utter helplessness and dependence, he felt the breath of political intrigue and slander amid the very ice of death gathering on his face.

"How living and how deep the wound" of such assault!

Like a giant pricked and thrust by the barbed arrows of pigmies, he writhed, not afraid to die, but craving only to live to see the hour of his vindication. That hour came even though the messenger of death waited without.

With my good friend, the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] I called at his sick chamber to express my sympathy and offer my congratulations. It was our last interview. His eyes, in which the fires of genius yet gleamed as if inextinguishable, spoke the emotions of a heart too full for utterance. The long, earnest pressure of the hand once so warm, but now almost cold with the touch of death, I shall never forget.

We, young and ardent, filled to overflowing with indignation at the wretch who had attempted to swear away the good name of this man, as basely as the two men of Belial swore away the life of Naboth, suggested that he be prosecuted and punished for perjury. With voice broken with intervals of difficult respiration he said, "O, no; that poor creature is unworthy of my hate. To his conscience and God we'll leave him. I am in no condition for further excitement. I would not disturb the good feeling and harmony in the House over my unanimous vindication by pursuing the matter into the courts."

What an illustration that was of his staid judgment, his lofty spirit, and undisturbed equipoise! On his tomb could be fitly written, as a tribute to the quality of his mind, Mens aequa in arduis. His star of life sunk ere yet it had reached its full promise—

> Snatched all too early from that august fame
> That on the serene heights of silvered age
> Waited with laureled hands.

But though life was sweet and luring, yet he so died that nothing in his life "became him like the leaving it."

In the old State of Virginia, the home and resting-place of his great political mentor, Thomas Jefferson, under the ceaseless vigils of wife and son and the benisons of the whole Republic, he passed to the land beyond the sea.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, standing within the saddening shadows which have fallen upon this floor from the broad wings of the angel of Death, who has so recently and so unwelcomely hovered over this stately Hall, and amid the flood of silent sorrows which pour in upon us on this mournful occasion, it is with great depression of spirits that I essay a discharge of the solemn duty I, in common with you all, owe the distinguished dead whose last funeral rites we perform to-day; but coming into this Hall as I do to fill the seat upon this floor made vacant by his untimely death, and from the large constituency which have so often loved to honor him while living, and who revere his memory when dead, it were eminently proper that I, in my own behalf and for them, should add my assent to and express our approval of the many eloquent but truthful eulogies that have been placed, like fragrant immortelles, upon the casket of his glorious memory.

For the first time in the history of our Government has the organization of the House of Representatives been disturbed and its members saddened by the death of its presiding officer. Though often, far too often, the cold hand of that ever-unwelcome visitor has been laid upon the prominent of its honored members, for the first time has he stalked silently and remorselessly across this floor, ascended to that exalted chair, and stricken with his chilling and killing blow the head of this great national council; and this fact should give a more serious current to our train of thought on this unusual occasion.

MICHAEL C. KERR was a native of Titusville, Pennsylvania, where he was born on the 15th of March, 1827. His parents were people in moderate circumstances, and of that old, sturdy Pennsylvania stock, whose children may be found scattered in every section of the country, giving life and vitality to every department of human enterprise. He was chiefly self-educated, but studied at the Erie Academy, whence he was graduated at the age of eighteen. During his attendance at the academy, Mr. KERR became attached to Miss Coover, and immediately after his graduation married her. By teaching school Mr. KERR earned the means to defray his expenses at the Louisville University, where he received the degree of bachelor of laws in 1851. In 1852 he removed to New Albany, Indiana, and began the practice of law. He early developed those traits of character which have since made him an enduring name among his countrymen. He was elected attorney of the city of his adoption, and in the performance of the duties intrusted to him he most ardnously devoted himself and attracted public attention to his abilities. At the end of one year's service he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county of Floyd, serving in that capacity but a single year, when, in 1856, he was nominated as a candidate for the Legislature, and in the October following was elected. It was during this year that attention was first attracted to his powers as an orator. In 1862 he was elected reporter of the supreme court of Indiana, and while occupying the position he prepared five volumes of reports, which are regarded as the best of the entire series issued from that court.

The effectiveness of Mr. KERR on the hustings pointed to him as the leader of his party in the second congressional district of his adopted State, and on the 12th of August, 1864, the district congressional convention at Jeffersonville nominated him as the candidate of his party to represent the district in the Thirty-ninth Congress, and at the October election following he was elected by a large majority. Upon taking his seat in Congress he was assigned to two committees of the House—Private Land Claims and of Accounts—serving with faithfulness to the interests of the public. Again, in 1866, he was returned as a member of the Fortieth Congress, and served on the Committees of Elections, and Railways and Canals. In 1868 his constituents returned him as a member of the Forty-first Congress, in which he served as a member of the Civil Service Committee, and it was during this session that he first assumed a prominence among his colleagues. In 1870 the people of the second district declared him their choice, and he was elected by the usual majority. Upon taking his seat in the Forty-second Congress he was placed upon the Committee of Ways and Means. During the two following, as in the preceding two years, he was frequently heard upon the floor of Congress in the advocacy of sound and statesmanlike views upon the subjects of the currency and taxation, and in opposition to every species of monopoly.

In 1872 Mr. KERR refused to enter the canvass for the nomination in his district. But at the meeting of the State convention he consented to accept the nomination for Congressman at large, but was defeated by Hon. Godlove S. Orth, by a majority of only 126 votes in the entire vote of the State; but he was only two years out of the House, coming in again by a great majority in 1875, when, as all the country remembers, he was chosen to preside over the deliberations of the body of which he was conspicuously and confessedly one of the ablest members.

MICHAEL CRAWFORD KERR was no ordinary man, but one formed by his Creator to fill an important mission in the stirring events of his stewardship here, and to this end he was endowed with clear conceptions, sound judgment, and a will to dare and do that which his convictions conceived to be right. But these convictions were never hastily nor recklessly formed. In the investigation of a subject brought before him for action, calmness and deliberation were always invoked, and when thus a conclusion was reached no sophistry, no mercenary motives, no sinister influences could suffice to move or sway him; but there, like the coast-rock beating backward the surging waves of ocean, he stood, fixed and immovable; and if overpowered by superior forces, like the sturdy oak whose head is bowed by the hurtling tempest, when the storm had passed he stood erect again, conscious of the correctness of his views. In that warfare which is ever being waged between the principles of right on the one hand and the errors of wrong on the other, he always stood the unyielding and aggressive champion of honor and rectitude, armed with a falchion whose very brightness dazzled and subdued. Nor did he wait to strike until the command for the reserve to advance was passed to the rear of the grand army of noble intellects; but, spurred on by high impulses and nerved by exalted instincts, he stood in the foremost ranks with his armor ever on and his trenchant blade drawn from the scabbard.

Though weak in physical powers

* * * His mind
Was formed to combat with his kind.
Strong in his will and of a mood
Which 'gainst the world in war had stood
And perished in the foremost rank
With joy.

It is not strange, therefore, that such a nature scorned to be led, but was proud to lead where honor and duty blazed the way. It was this which restrained him from yielding to the mistaken fancies or erring clamor of the masses. He was not

* * * That soul
Which creeps and winds beneath the mob's control;
That courts the rabble's smile, the rabble's nod,
And makes, like Egypt, every beast its god.

When public sentiment was right he was foremost among its advocates, but when wrong, like another Socrates, he braced himself manfully against the erring flood. In this he was truly a great man. The world hath need of all such noble natures which God hath blessed us with, and the loss of his self-sacrificing patriotism, his exalted precepts, and his noble example is irreparable. When he fell the ranks of the gallant few with whom he fought and kept the faith lost a power they could illy spare, and where he fell there was left a vacancy in the ranks which all our prayers and tears for the regretted dead can never fill.

To this strong characteristic must be added the no less commendible trait of character which everywhere and at all times stamp him as a man pre-eminently honest and pure. Descended from an ancient Highland Scottish clan whose name he bore, he seemed to have inherited largely that sturdy, honest, and incorruptible nature which so distinguished the Wallace, the Douglass, the Bruce, and the Roderick Dhu of those better days. This attribute so inwrapped him like a robe as to shield him from the advances of the mercenary and corrupt. So strong, so marked was this phase of character that in a long and active public life, in which the bitter animosities of rivals and political adversaries were often excited, but once was an assault ever made upon it, and then the shafts aimed by envy and propelled by base designs fell harmless at his feet, covering his accusers with confusion and shame. The attempt was as harmless as the casting of a toy-dart at the Colossus of Rhodes, and as futile as an attempt to darken the heavens with a miniature cloud of dust. The investigation, like the testing ordeal for the purer metals, left him the brighter for the friction and the more universally appreciated for the seal of national approval which it stamped upon his immortal memory. To lose a public man with two such rare and desirable traits of character in times like these, when the fibers of our free institutions seem ready to burst asunder from the increasing strain produced by the degenerating tendencies of the age, adds a patriotic poignancy to our grief and an intensified depth to the shadows of a nation's sorrows, which shall be lifted only when the sunlight of better days shall dispel the dangers which brood over us like the menacing hand of a Nemesis.

Bringing into his public life and places of trust such Spartan virtues, it is not surprising that he so rapidly ascended from the lowest to the highest plane of prominence, and commanded at all times renewed and increasing confidence, admiration, and preferment, until, caught up in the ready arms of an approving nation, he was seated in that exalted chair, once occupied by America's greatest and most distinguished statesmen: Trumbull, Macon, Dayton, Clay, and Polk—a place second only, to the highest honor and most precious gift in the power of this Republic to bestow. Here, while in that proud position, presiding over the councils of a great people, shaping the legislation of a mighty nation, in the flood-tide of his prosperity and usefulness, it pleased the mighty God who holds alike the destinies of nations and individuals in his omnicient hand to remove him from the field of his labor and place his ashes in that sacred urn, among that constellation of statesmen whose names are inscribed in characters of never-fading light upon the tablets of our history. It was a sad bereavement to his afflicted friends; it was a national misfortune, but we bow in meek submission to the decrees of that superior and divine wisdom which "doeth all things well."

It is not for me to extol the labors of the deceased while a member and officer of this House. That task were more fitly done and has been more ably performed by those of his eloquent colleagues who have preceded me, and whose encomiums I shall bear with me to the bosom of his immediate constituency with a just pride and satisfaction. To be assured that throughout all his congressional career, and much of it embracing the darkest hours of this Republic, he occupied the high grounds of statesmanship and never for once descended to the level of the mere politician; that his utterances were ever for the needs of the whole country and were never circumscribed by the demands of mere party; that his efforts were ever for the great good of the many and never to their exclusion, in the interests of the few, confirms the conceptions formed of him at home and makes universal the picture engraven upon the hearts of his own people.

While the deceased stood thus distinguished from the masses of men in his public life, in his private virtues he was pre-eminently a man—the highest and best type of man. While many of the most celebrated characters of history have had their glories dimmed with reflections from dark spots upon their private lives, Mr. KERR was wholly free from any great private fault whose presence detracted from the public esteem in which he was held. He was temperate and sober, honest and upright, frugal and charitable, generous and just, conscientious and a Christian, a warm friend, a constant husband, and an affectionate father. He had his likes and dislikes, but they were distributed by reason and controlled by causes. He had his partialities and his prejudices, but they were never wholly without foundation. He had his peculiarities, but they never approached distasteful eccentricities, and with all the details of character the aggregated whole rendered him a desirable neighbor, a useful citizen, and an esteemed man.

We have inadvertently pronounced him dead. True we have placed his mortal remains in the tomb of his fathers and his ashes are mingling with the dust from which they arose, but he is not dead. Such men never die. There has been a change, yet it has been one in which but the grossness of earth-life has been swept away, leaving only the intellectual, the spiritual, and therefore the higher and purer life, to commune with us, teach us, and lead us onward and upward. He lives in his work and example; nor will they die wholly until in the dim distance of future time the obliterating waves of oblivion shall submerge all that has been and now is, and the dark funeral pall shall be thrown over all the glories of the past and greatness of the present.

As a proper closing of these solemn ceremonies, I now offer the following resolutions, and move their adoption:

Resolved, That the sad announcement of the death of MICHAEL C. KERR, late member from the State of Indiana, and Speaker of this House, is received by us in the deepest sorrow and profoundest regret, and that in his untimely decease the House of Representatives of the United States has lost an impartial, competent, and noble presiding officer, a faithful and patriotic member.

Resolved, That in testimony of our respect for the memory of the deceased Speaker, his chair be draped in mourning during the unfinished term of the Forty-fourth Congress, and as a further evidence of our continuing esteem for the dead, the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That the Senate be informed of the death of the late Speaker by forwarding to that body a copy of these resolutions, and that the Clerk transmit a copy of the same to the afflicted family of the illustrious dead.

Resolved, That, as a further tribute of respect to the departed officer, this House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the resolutions, they were unanimously adopted; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. FELTON: The petition of 60 citizens of Polk and Haralson Counties, Georgia, for a post-route from Rock Mart, Polk County, to Buchanan, via Tallapoosa copper mines in Haralson County, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. RIDDLE: The petition of J. D. Bond & Brother, of Davidson County, Tennessee, to be refunded $171.75 taxes illegally collected from them, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. SHEAKLEY: The petition of William Spillon, late a private in Company A, Fourteenth Regiment New York Cavalry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 18, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of Job H. Jackson, Joseph G. Moore, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William A. H. Allen, passed assistant engineer United States Navy, praying to be allowed the increased pay of his grade from the date at which he completed his term of sea service as required by law in his previous grade; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Natick, Massachusetts, signed by its pastor and other officers, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of the Good Templars of the State of New Hampshire, officially signed, representing 1,200 members, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of Messrs. Howes and Crowell, and 38 others, merchants and importers of Boston, Massachusetts, in favor of action upon the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BAYARD. I have received the petitions of certain Sons of Temperance, sent to me through A. M. Powell, of Washington, District of Columbia, to be presented, praying that the National Government shall take cognizance of the trade in alcoholic liquor. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 152) relating to the promotion of commodores on the retired list of the Navy, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement, a House bill of similar import having passed at the last session of Congress; and the motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 771) regulating the accountability for clothing and other property in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Marine Corps, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

CONTESTED PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. WRIGHT, agreeably to notice, introduced a bill (S. No. 1082) to establish a court for the trial of contested elections in the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I shall not ask at this time a reference of the bill. I have drawn it, I may be allowed to say, without consultation with any person. It embodies my views touching legislation as indicated by the title just read by the Secretary. I am not so committed to its terms nor so wedded to its plans but that I shall be very cheerful indeed to receive any suggestions from others looking to its perfection. I at all times mistrust my judgment upon any matter and the correctness of my action, and I especially do so upon a question of this magnitude and this gravity.

I may be allowed to say that I do not share the feelings of many who imagine that troubles and dangers are in advance of us. I have confidence that these feared troubles will vanish as we approach them. There may be threats and there may be turbulence, but in my judgment the Constitution and the law of the land will ride supreme over all of them. My confidence is in the practical common sense and patriotism of the people of this country. We have in this country almost a traditional love of peaceful political methods. We have in this country a traditional hatred of everything like license and violence. My confidence is that this traditional love of patriotic, peaceful methods, legal methods, and this hatred of vices and violence, will triumph.

The bill that I have introduced is in the direction indicated. It looks to a tribunal to settle the question as between contestants after the vote shall be declared. I belive we have the power to thus legislate, and I believe that a law can be passed which will meet the great emergency.

I ask that the bill which I have introduced may lie on the table for the present, and shall ask that it be referred either to a select committee, if such shall be raised, or to such other committee as I may indicate. I desire to say also that if a recess should take place I shall embrace the earliest opportunity after the convening of the Senate to present some views in favor of this measure. If no recess shall take place I shall probably ask the Senate to hear me some time next week.

Several SENATORS. Let the bill be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHAFFEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1083) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company," approved June 8, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1084) for the relief of John N. Hall; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1085) allowing pay to certain watchmen and others therein named; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1086) granting a pension to Isaac Herring; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1087) to divide the State of Nebraska into two judicial districts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1088) to establish a post-road; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1089) relating to evidence in causes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Hoy McLean be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE ON COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the resolution which I offered on Friday last for the appointment of a select committee in answer to the message of the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may, in their judgment, be best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and the due declaration of the result; and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives herewith.

The resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee.

FOURTH ARKANSAS CAVALRY VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 683) for the relief of the officers and privates of the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of War, upon the possession of evidence of service which to him may seem satisfactory, is hereby directed to cause to be investigated the claims of the forces known as the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, enlisted for twelve months, under the authority of Major-General Frederick Steele, in Arkansas, dated November 21, 1863; and if he find the troops performed actual service, he shall cause the officers and soldiers thereof to be paid at the same rates for their actual services rendered, while absent from their homes, as were allowed by law to other volunteer forces in the military service at the same time. And in estimating the amount due the said force, the officers and non-commissioned officers thereof shall be paid under the mustering regulations of the Army in force at the time the regiment was under recruitment. And no allowance shall be made for any troops who did not perform actual military service in full co-operation with, and subject to the orders of, the United States authorities.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Arkansas be kind enough to explain this bill, if there is no written report?

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill was reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL,] but I am familiar with the facts in the case. This is the case of a fragment of a regiment of troops that was called into service by Major-General Steele commanding the Department of Arkansas. They served less than twelve months. After they had been in service some time the War Department decided that their services were not needed, and a question arose as to whether they were properly organized. The order for their organization came, as I say, from the major-general in command of the department and not from the War Department. These men did this service. Congress passed a bill of a similar character to relieve another fraction of a regiment some two or three years ago. There were two regiments, one of infantry and one of cavalry, raised in this way. Congress passed a bill to relieve the infantry regiment, but there was no relief provided for the cavalry regiment. This bill merely provides that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to make inquiry as to the organization of this regiment and as to whether these men did actual service, and if he finds that they did actual service for the Government that they shall be paid as other volunteers were paid. It is the re-enactment of another bill which was passed some two or three years ago to cover a similar case of an infantry regiment in that State. As I understand, the cases are alike. The Senator from Missouri can state the facts more fully perhaps.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was an act passed for another regiment, an infantry regiment, and under it the Secretary of War acted upon some cases, and I believe had the fortune of rejecting every solitary one of them, nothing being allowed; but still he investigated the matter. This bill is drawn precisely as that act and follows its exact language. This bill was reported by me, and I think I drew it in the exact language of the other bill, which was drawn by the Secretary of War.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire whether General Steele was an officer of the Army of the United States?

Mr. CLAYTON. He was the major-general commanding the department of Arkansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill assumes, and therefore settles the fact, that General Steele did enlist these companies of cavalry. I submit to the Senator from Arkansas whether the bill, unless we have some evidence on the subject, ought to assume that fact? If we are going to refer anything to the Secretary of War, ought not the Secretary of War to be authorized to inquire whether this enlistment was made under the authority of the laws of the United States?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think if it was based upon that, the relief would fail, because if these men had been enlisted under the laws of the United States they would have received their pay at once. The difficulty in the way is that the major-general commanding the department assumed to accept the services of these men. They were citizens of Arkansas who remained true to the Union and entered the service, I think, during the year 1863 or 1864. The major-general of the department assumed to organize them, and did put them into the service. They served for about six months as a small fragment of a regiment, and at the expiration of that time the question arose at the War Department as to their authority for enlistment and they were discharged. This bill is to cover that case. Of course, if there is any doubt as to whether Major-General Steele did make this enlistment, that question might be left to the Secretary of War to determine; but there is no question about that; he did issue the order for their enlistment; but then if the Senator from Vermont desires to leave that also a question of inquiry with the Secretary of War, I have no objection to having the bill so amended. The only thing we ask is that if these men did render service to the Government they shall have an opportunity to be paid as other soldiers were paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What were these troops employed about?

Mr. CLAYTON. They were employed as soldiers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but were they employed as soldiers in merely keeping the peace in the State, as soldiers in Vermont were employed often during the war—not often, but on one grand occasion when we were invaded from the north by the confederates—or were they employed to make war against the common enemies of the country?

Mr. CLAYTON. They were armed and equipped by the Government of the United States, and were under the command of the military officer there, and were employed as other soldiers were employed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Were they put into any general Army that was moving from place to place, or stationed somewhere by themselves?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think they were put in the Army with the others. That is my recollection of the case; but that can be all left subject to inquiry, if it is desired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish we could have a report from the Secretary of War showing exactly what the history of this regiment was before we are called upon to do this thing.

Mr. COCKRELL. The matter was referred to the Secretary of War and he wrote back referring to the act which we passed applicable to the infantry regiment, stating that he did not discover that it covered only the infantry regiment, and he stated what he had done under that act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is his letter among the papers?

Mr. COCKRELL. His letter is with the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary of War read.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Secretary of War thought when he examined it that an act had already been passed covering this case, and referred to that act which had been drawn with a great deal of care and which covered the whole case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary of War read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 17, 1876.

SIR: Acknowledging the receipt of your reference of the petition of William J Patton, for payment of members of the four companies of the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry, enlisted under an authority from Major-General Fred. Steele, I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of the report of the Adjutant-General, which embraces information touching the several questions contained in your letter of the 3d instant.

I also return the petition of Mr. Patton.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear the letter of the Adjutant-General read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
April 12, 1876.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

By act of Congress approved March 18, 1870, the Secretary of War, upon the possession of evidence which to him might seem satisfactory, was directed to investigate the claim of the force known as the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry, enlisted for twelve months (without the sanction of the War Department) under an authority from Major-General Fred. Steele; and, if he found that the force performed actual service, in full co-operation with and subject to the orders of the United States authorities, to cause the officers and enlisted men thereof to be paid the same rates as were allowed by law to other volunteer forces in the military service at the same time.

On the promulgation of this law numerous claims were presented, including sets of rolls by claim agents and others.

Those claims were carefully investigated in connection with the official records of this office, and it was found:

1. That the returns of the district of Northeast Arkansas, made at the time of the actual enlistment of the force and based on presence, regimental and post returns, show for the months of January, February, March, April, and May, 1864, a much smaller force than that on and covered by the rolls submitted.

2. Men whose names appear on the rolls referred to have heretofore been paid as members of other organizations for the period for which pay is claimed.

3. Notations setting forth the loss of horses appear on one set of rolls which are not enumerated on other rolls on file.

4. Men enlisted by one officer are claimed to have been enlisted by another, and even then the dates of enlistment as claimed to have been made by each are entirely at varience.

5. One set of rolls bears the name of a man as an officer, while on another he is borne as a corporal.

6. The rolls certify to company organizations existing, when it is known from the records of this office that the companies, as such, were never organized.

The foregoing, in connection with the fact that contradictions as to when, where, and by whom many of the force were enlisted, indicated clearly that fraud permeated the claims to a greater or less extent, and, under the rulings of the Treasury Department, that fraud, in a portion of claim, invalidated the whole, and justified the military branch of the Government in withholding any claim to which was attached a suspicion of fraud, which would invalidate such claim in law. The department declined to accept the rolls submitted as correct evidence of service.

The foregoing facts were officially communicated to Hon. Elisha Baxter, June 28, 1872, and to his attorneys, Messrs. Lowe and Archer, on May 13, 1875.

Since the latter date no new evidence has been submitted in the premises.

The bill for the relief of the Fourth Arkansas Mounted Infantry was carefully prepared by the War Department, alike to protect the interests of the Government, as well as those of all legal claimants, and it is held that, as the law now stands, any and all just claims can be met without further legislation by Congress.

The petition of Mr. William J. Patton is returned herewith.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. CLAYTON. This report was made through misapprehension on the part of the Secretary of War. The case which he there speaks of having investigated is in regard to another organization, an Arkansas infantry organization. This bill is intended to cover a cavalry organization, which is entirely different from the one on which he made this report. As will be seen, this bill, which is in the exact language of the law he refers to there, will give the Secretary of War full power to investigate this case. A similiar bill did authorize the investigation of the claims under this infantry organization and resulted in their getting nothing; the claims were ruled out. All that this cavalry organization ask is that they may have the same opportunity of settling their claims, and if the Secretary of War finds that they are not just he will only treat them as he did in that case I presume.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment. I am satisfied after the explanation that the case ought to be investigated; but I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee in the manner I have suggested in the bill which I send to the Chair, which I believe is satisfactory to my friend from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the amendment of the committee, after the word "volunteers," it is proposed to insert "alleged to have been;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War, upon the possession of evidence of service which to him may seem satisfactory, is hereby directed to cause to be investigated the claims of the forces known as the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, alleged to have been enlisted for twelve months, under the authority of Major-General Frederick Steele, in Arkansas, dated November 21, 1863.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the amendment was in line 10, after the word "service," to insert "for the United States;" and in line 11 to strike out the word "their" before "actual" and insert "such;" so as to read:

And if he find the troops performed actual service for the United States he shall cause the officers and soldiers thereof to be paid at the same rates for such actual services rendered, while absent from their homes, as were allowed by law to other volunteer forces in the military service at the same time.

The next amendment to the amendment was at the close to insert the words "and for the United States;" so as to make the clause read:

And no allowance shall be make for any troops who did not perform actual military service in full co-operation with, and subject to the orders of, the United States, and for the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is satisfactory.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution for consideration, giving notice that he would call it up to-morrow:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That when the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on Friday, the 22d day of December instant, they adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 3d day of January, 1877.

REPAVEMENT OF STREETS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that the resolution I offered the other day be taken up at this time for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, directed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of repaving or otherwise improving all or any portion of the streets and avenues named in the schedule hereto annexed, and to ascertain, as near as may be, the cost of such work, and the proportions to be borne respectively by the United States, the District of Columbia out of its general revenues, and the property-owners along said streets and avenues, and to report by bill or otherwise.

J. W. PHILLIPS,
Overseer.

The resolution was agreed to.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WRIGHT. I gave notice on Friday that I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration to-day of the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States, a bill which was reported from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment on the 25th of May, 1876. I stated at the time I gave this notice that I did not propose to enter into any discussion of the bill, but stated that I deemed it to be my duty to the committee and to the Senate and to the question to at least ask that a vote be taken by the Senate at this time. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to reconsider the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. That bill, having passed both Houses, was vetoed by the President of the United States. The question now is on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been returned by the President of the United States with his objection——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the message of the President read. It may furnish a good reason for not passing the bill; presumptively it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Herewith I return Senate bill No. 172, entitled "An act fixing the salary of the President of the United States," without my approval.

I am constrained to this course from a sense of duty to my successors in office, to myself, and to what is due to the dignity of the position of Chief Magistrate of a nation of more than forty millions of people.

When the salary of the President of the United States, pursuant to the Constitution, was fixed at $25,000 per annum, we were a nation of but three millions of people, poor from a long and exhaustive war, without commerce or manufactories, with but few wants, and those cheaply supplied. The salary must then have been deemed small for the responsibilities and dignity of the position, but justifiably so from the impoverished condition of the Treasury and the simplicity it was desired to cultivate in the Republic.

The salary of Congressmen under the Constitution was first fixed at $6 per day for the time actually in session—an average of about one hundred and twenty days to each session—or $720 per year, or less than one-thirtieth of the salary of the President.

Congress have legislated upon their own salaries from time to time since, until finally it reached $5,000 per annum, or one-fifth that of the President, before the salary of the latter was increased.

No one having a knowledge of the cost of living at the national capital will contend that the present salary of Congressmen is too high, unless it is the intention to make the office one entirely of honor, when the salary should be abolished—a proposition repugnant to our republican ideas and institutions.

I do not believe the citizens of this Republic desire their public servants to serve them without a fair compensation for their services.

Twenty-five thousand dollars does not defray the expenses of the Executive for one year, or has not in my experience. It is not now one-fifth in value what it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution in supplying demands and wants.

Having no personal interest in this matter, I have felt myself free to return this bill to the House in which it originated, with my objections, believing that in doing so I meet the wishes and judgment of the great majority of those who indirectly pay all the salaries and other expenses of Government.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 18, 1876.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

At the first session, begun and held at the city of Washington on Monday, the 6th day of December, 1875.

An act fixing the salary of the President of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act did originate in the Senate.

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am satisfied that Samuel J. Tilden desires to bring back the simplicity and frugality of the fathers, and that he is able to live on $25,000 a year. I can therefore safely vote for the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He will live on less, so far as the United States is concerned, I hope. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, since the beginning of the session the Senate has borne a striking resemblance to a debating society, occupying much of its time in discussion, and it looks somewhat like a new departure that so important a document as the message of the President should be passed upon without the utterance of a single word.

If the convention that formed our Federal Constitution could have foreseen the range of presidential action as well as the dangers and perplexities involved in the presidential question, it might have furnished an argument against the establishment of that branch of the Government. We have been engaged for some time in trying to arrange a plan of counting in or counting out a President, and we are now confronted with the solid and substantial question of executive compensation. The bill under reconsideration, incumbered as it is at present by presidential objection, was reported and recommended by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. As I have the honor to be a member of that committee, it is proper that I should say something. I desire to say enough and no more than to place me in a proper attitude upon the record.

The will of the people and the wishes of the States, as expressed through their chosen representatives, seem to have small weight with their chief executive officer. Another veto message admonishes us of the fact that the legislation of the country must in every particular harmonize and accord with his own peculiar views of public policy. The argument of the President is based upon the assumption that the restoration of the former salary would seriously impair the dignity of the position, which, to say the least of it, is rather a sandy foundation for such a structure. Nor does his appeal to his own experience make it more conclusive, since it is cheerfully admitted that every man may expend more than his income, if he has the requisite capital or credit.

How or where the President could have obtained the information which satisfies him that his course will be approved by the judgment of the great majority of tax-payers, it is impossible to conjecture. Was there ever a petition presented praying for the increase of his salary? Has there ever been a remonstrance against the reduction? Or can the unaided sagacity of the President enable him to understand the wants and the wishes of the people better than they are comprehended and understood by their own immediate representatives? In the long line of his illustrious predecessors there was not probably a single man who felt that it was undignified or unbecoming to serve the people at $25,000 a year. From George Washington to Andrew Johnson, through all changes of administrations and parties, through all fluctuations in currency and through all the vicissitudes of peace and war, President and people seem to have been satisfied with the rate of executive compensation. But on an unlucky day the Congress of the United States, with a lofty appreciation of the value of their past services, voted that which looks very much like a donation of $5,000 to each of its own members, and, to provide against all contingencies, an additional allowance of $100,000 was made to the President who signed the bill, to be paid during his subsequent term of service. If this tremendous increase was effected through the agency of an appropriation bill, how did it happen when the same agency was invoked for reduction that it was treated with scorn and contempt, as if it were a novelty and an outrage upon the well-settled principles and practices of the Government? If the Senate insist that the law must be changed before appropriations are reduced and refuse to change the law, that is a most effectual bar to all progress in the way of economy.

During a former session I heard comparisons instituted between the salary of our President and the enormous incomes of the kings and potentates of Europe. It must not be forgotten or overlooked that our Government was neither formed nor fashioned after the model of the despotisms of the Old World. Previous to the Revolution, America was under a monarchy, and so little taste had she for that institution that for seven long years her fields were wasted by fire and her sons were mown down by the sword, that the crowned head as well as titled noble might offer their homage to the sovereignty of the people. Whatever may have been spoken, written, or believed of "the divine right of kings" to plunder and oppress their subjects for their own aggrandizement, was tried on this continent by wager of battle, and the verdict was in favor of the people; so that royal prerogative and royal incomes, whether great or small, are entitled to no consideration in the adjustment of any question touching the administration of our affairs.

Our Government may exercise the powers delegated by the Constitution. It was intended to be plain and simple in its operation, and its machinery was designed to run, not in the exclusive interest of office-holders, but for the common benefit of all the people. The harmony of our system is its chief attraction. In building a house for the occupation of the President, the capitals of Europe were not ransacked for plans and specifications of a gorgeous palace, but a plain structure of solid material was erected, a fit residence for a republican president, and the salary was fixed at a sum not to excite cupidity but to give him a decent support while in the discharge of his duty. Let us bring it back to the old amount, and if there is less of ostentation it will be more in accordance with the spirit and genius of our free institutions. I give it as my deliberate opinion that there should be a very considerable reduction in all official salaries. The distressed condition of the country and the very existence of the Republic demand it. Ambition and avarice are the most irrepressible and insatiate passions of human nature, and they will not hesitate to employ fraud and force in carrying out their objects. If this Government shall recover from the shock of the last presidential election, it cannot withstand the frequent repetition of such imbittered contests. In view, then, of the importance of securing tranquillity in the future, of establishing order and maintaining inviolate the rights of the citizen, let us purify ambition by striking down the temptations of avarice.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, a test of the sense of the Senate upon the subject is now to be taken in what I consider a proper method. A proposition was made at the last session of the Senate by ingrafting this measure on an appropriation bill to coerce the executive branch of the Government, at the cost of losing an appropriation bill necessary for the support of the Government, into adopting a measure which he had complete justification under the Constitution as an independent branch of the Government, and, as I believe, under the facts of the case, for refusing to sanction. I am glad that the question has been brought up for the consideration of the Senate in the proper manner, in which each Senator, according to his judgment of the advisability of the measure, shall vote.

I have heretofore given to the Senate my reasons for concurring in the main with the judgment of the President of the United States on this subject. I consider that so far as I have representative power I am compelled to use it for the interest of the public according to my best judgment. My best judgment in this case accords in substance with the views expressed by the President, and therefore I for one will vote against this measure to diminish the official salary of the President of the United States after the 3d day of next March.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish in very few words to assign the reason which will constrain me to vote for the passage of this bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. Exactly by what measure I should gauge, in these times of pecuniary stringency, the sum which ought to be paid by the nation to its Chief Magistrate, and exactly the sum which that measure would indicate, I am not at this moment prepared to say. It does not necessarily concern the vote which I am called on to give to make such a determination in my own mind. The answer I shall return to my name will stand upon a different footing.

On an appropriation bill, in the dying hours of a session, coming to the Senate and going to the House from a conference committee, so that the entire bill without changing the dot of an i or the cross of a t must be adopted or must fail, came provisions raising from $5,000 to $7,500 a year the compensation to be paid to the members of each House; also as parcel of these provisions one which doubled the salary of the President of the United States. The first of these provisions to which I have alluded has already gone down, removed by repeal from the statute-book, removed by a repeal urged on the attention of both Houses by the strenuous—(to use no stronger word)—manifestations of popular disapprobation, which manifestations were accepted by both Houses, I do not mean as the reason for action, but as a fair indication and measure of what the public judgment indicated that legislative action should do. The statute which added that $2,500 to congressional pay was repealed and congressional pay was put back at $5,000, where it stood for a long time anterior to the enactment. There it stands now; and my judgment, I turn aside to say, the remark being suggested by one which fell from the Senator from Delaware, is that $5,000 a year, considered in any way in which it can truly be considered as compensation for the President, is compensation quite as adequate, to say the least, as is $5,000 a year for a member of this body. However that may be, the legislation to which I have referred was undone, the law was re-established, members of both Houses declaring that they so re-established the old law and the old compensation, not as matter of judgment speaking to what of right it ought to be, but because the character, the circumstances, the various considerations surrounding this legislation which had been put upon an appropriation bill were such as to call loudly for its undoing, for setting back the law where it stood before this interposition occurred.

Now, Mr. President, I am aware that the case of members of the Senate, sitting here on the last night of the session, voting upon the question of their own compensation, and that relating back to the beginning of the Congress, is distinguishable somewhat from another feature of the same provision of the bill; to wit, doubling the salary of the President of the United States. But, making allowance for that difference, my apprehension has always been that it was the judgment of a majority of the two Houses on the last occasion when action was taken on this subject, as it was my judgment, that, under the circumstances, the whole of that legislation upon the appropriation bill ought to be expunged; the whole thing should be put back, the whole act should be undone; and then, whatever might be wise or proper as to fixing over again the compensation of the members of the two Houses, the compensation of the members of the Cabinet, the compensation of the President and Vice-President or of any or all other officers, should be taken up anew, unembarrassed by the odium which, in many minds, attached to the way in which a part of this was once done, and should be considered on its merits as applicable to the future. And at this moment I am reminded of a thing which I had forgotton and which is quite pertinent to the line of my remarks. If I have fallen into an error, Senators will correct me. My impression is that this same legislation on the appropriation bill raised the annual salary of members of the Cabinet, whose compensation surely is inadequate if the compensation of the President of the United States is inadequate. They received $8,000 a year; it was raised to $10,000. In the reformation which took place, the legislation to undo what had been done, we did not omit to strike down the members of the Cabinet to the old $8,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I think you are wrong.

Mr. CONKLING. No; here sits the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] who was then a Cabinet officer, who, in addition, is always accurate, and he tells me that I am right. So we find that we did not stop with the compensation of the members of the two Houses in repealing; we extended it to the members of the Cabinet; and I am bound to say—and there at least, I think, the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will agree with me—that I am utterly unable to distinguish between the propriety of leaving the salary of members of the Cabinet to stand at $10,000, $2,000 having been added, and leaving the salary of the President to stand at the $50,000 to which it had been advanced.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONKLING. I will if I have time. I see that the morning hour is about out.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is aware, of course, that it extended to a great many other officers, and we undid everything that the Constitution allowed us to undo.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for making that suggestion. I rose without reflection, and several of the incidents pertinent were not in mind, and it did not occur to me that the action was so broad as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. CRAGIN. As the Senator from New York expresses a desire to do away with all the legislation in reference to the increase of salary, I would inquire of him what he proposes to do with the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONKLING. I propose to do with the judges of the Supreme Court and with all other judges, and with all other men not judges, and with all other things with which I am called upon to act, exactly what the Constitution of the United States commands me to do; and inasmuch as within the commands of the Constitution I cannot touch the judges of the Supreme Court in the way indicated by the question of the honorable Senator, I propose to do nothing in that regard. But inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States does commit this question to our consideration, and inasmuch as I am not able to select this one single thing and say that that should be saved from a condemnation so sweeping that it has omitted nothing else in repealing the legislation to which I have referred which was deemed so obnoxious, I must in consistency, in accordance with the votes I have given heretofore, in accordance with the original vote which I recorded against the proposition, in accordance with the vote which I have given on one or two previous occasions to repeal the provision increasing the salary, I must now, notwithstanding the views of the President, adhere to my belief that consistency and reason require that we shall complete the repeal of this legislation, all the rest of which has vanished except as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests where the Constitution itself so hedges it about that it has forever passed beyond our reach.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to the Senator proceeding?

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust there will be no objection. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business is not present, and I trust that this matter will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor on the bill called up by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the vote which I shall give on the question now pending, it is to me a matter of perfect indifference who may be our next President. Whether it shall be a man who has an ample fortune, and without encroaching upon which he may be able to bestow the hospitalities of the nation as they should be bestowed, and who might discharge the duties of Executive without a dollar of compensation, or whether it may be a man of humble means requiring the contributions of the Government as a compensation for the services which he shall discharge to the country; whether it shall be the one or the other, so far as the vote which I shall give upon this question is concerned, I am entirely indifferent. I confess I was surprised at the speech of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] made in one single sentence. I will not characterize that speech as I think it deserves; I will not characterize it as I think the calm judgment of the public will estimate it.

I shall vote against the passage of this bill, not because I voted against it when it originally passed, not because I voted against it when it was in a bill coupled and conditioned with a variety of other salaries, but I shall vote against the passage of this bill because my judgment tells me that it is right so to vote. When the bill was passed, I could see no possible course for the President to pursue but to return it to us with his objections, as he has done. The salary had been increased; he had received that increase of salary; and for him to approve of this bill would place him in a position which made him distinct from all other persons who had held the executive authority of this country. Consistent with his own position, aside from the true merits of the case, I did not see how he could avoid vetoing the bill as it is called, returning it to us with his objections for that reason. But it was of course a reason he would not state. He has, however, stated in his message returning the bill to us reasons which I think ought to be conclusive with us. I do not myself believe that there was any objection in the community to the increase of the salary of the President when connected with that of others. I heard none, and my recollection of the discussion of the press is that it was very generally believed and stated that it would have been a right thing to do to increase the President's salary, but the wrong consisted in the increase of the other salaries connected therewith.

Now, take the condition of our Government at the present time and contrast it with what it was when the President's salary was fixed; look at the population then and now; examine the duties devolved upon the President then and upon the President now; look upon the hospitalities that belong to that position, which are the hospitalities of the nation; and the compensation of $50,000 is meager to-day in comparison with what the original salary was when it was established. I think, sir, that in the eyes of many persons from other nations who visit us they estimate us very much by the hospitality of the nation. It is at least one standard by which foreign people measure us as a people, and perhaps our institutions.

But looking at it in its broad and comprehensive sense, looking at the condition of things then and the condition of things now, I hold that the sum which the law at present allows is but a meager one as a just equivalent for the responsibilities assumed and the duties discharged. We know, all of us, that many of our Presidents have left the Executive Mansion absolutely poor, and I have myself, on more than one occasion, on several, contributed by indirection sums which became absolutely necessary for their support in after life. Who does not know that purchase of work after work of this statesman and that, who was President of the United States, has been made by Congress that never would have been made but for the absolute poverty of the individual? Does it reflect to our character as a people, does it come home to our judgment, that we shall ask the best heads of the best of our statesmen in guiding and directing the destinies of this Government and then turn them out in after life to little less than absolute poverty? I think that an adequate compensation should be given to every public officer, and believing the present is not adequate, I certainly shall vote to keep it where it is rather than to diminish it. I hope, sir, that such will be the judgment of the Senate. I believe such is the judgment of the American people, and that the people themselves will characterize the whole movement as one which I will not characterize here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? On this question the vote will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Morrill, Morton, Price, Sherman, Thurman, Whyte, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Blaine, Booth, Bontwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Chaffee, Dorsey, Edmunds, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Windom, and Withers—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Teller, Wadleigh, Wallace, and West—31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 25 and the nays 19. Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted for the same, the bill is not passed.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution relative to the electoral vote of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was entitled to the floor this morning on this proposition, but I regret to say that he is laboring under very severe indisposition to-day and is not able to be in the Senate. He is very desirous, however, of being heard on the resolution, and has sent me word to that effect. Of course, so far as I am concerned, I am very desirous to accommodate him. I understand, however, that there are some other Senators who desire to speak upon the subject, and I propose that we go on, but I do not wish to ask for a vote to-day for the reason that the Senator from Illinois is not able to be here. I understand the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEY] desires to submit some remarks.

Mr. KEY. Mr. President, the advantage, or rather one of the advantages, which we claim for our form of government is, that the people select their rulers. The voice of the majority is said to be potential, and when it fails to have force and expression, under legal authority—when it is or shall be suppressed by power or subterfuge or other means—it is or will be time that our gravest fears should be excited and strongest apprehensions aroused in regard to the safety of our liberties and the perpetuity of republican institutions. It becomes a subject of deep concern, not to one party or the other, but to the whole body of the people, and affects alike the interests of the present and the future. If the voice of the majority shall be stifled and disregarded, the proud boast of republican institutions will be gone, and the nod of faction or beck of the tyrant will take the place of the people's voice. We at this moment stand on the brink of danger, and we should pause long and consider well before doubtful steps are taken. I am no alarmist. I am not afraid of civil war. I do not believe that it is near at hand in any threatened event. The lessons of our late struggle are too fresh; its events are too recent; its scenes of carnage and death too vividly impressed; its agonies, distress, and losses too apparent and well-remembered, to permit another and similar contest. Our widows are yet in mourning; the orphans' tears are not yet dried; and all around are the lame and the wounded. The places made waste and desolate have not yet been rebuilt, nor do they blossom. The southern section of the Union is shorn of power, and must submit to contumely, reproach, and injustice, if they be heaped upon it. Its people are without remedy for wrongs, if the Constitution and laws of the land fail them. As one of the members of this august body from that section, I am sent here with no threatening message. If our voice be disregarded, our valid elections set aside, we may complain; we may invoke peaceful remedies, but we cannot, will not, resort to violent measures. It were madness in us to attempt it.

The closeness of our centennial presidential election, its peculiar features, and the methods of obtaining results have attracted profound interest, and the whole country is now in anxious suspense and excitement in respect to the entire subject, in all its aspects. Senators, let us be calm, considerate, and, as far as possible, dispassionate, in all that we shall say and do in regard to this important matter. Let us remember that in an election which, by law, belongs to the people the will of the majority is sovereign and conclusive, and must be respected and obeyed as such. There is no revising power or tribunal to which we may appeal from its decision without violation of essential principles which underlie and sustain our Government.

I assume this proposition as sound and indisputable: On a doubtful question, involving the theory or practice of the Government, that construction ought to be given which is consonant with the spirit of our institutions, and in harmony with the general principles of our fundamental law. That is to say, if one construction, in case of an election by the people, gives force and effect to their ascertained will, and the other failed to do so, that construction ought to be given which is in favor of and gives efficiency to the popular will, and this must be peculiarly so when the choice of the highest officer of the nation is involved. I do not wish to be understood as maintaining that an election held contrary to law, or in violation of law, is to be sustained, however clear and decisive the voice of the majority may be expressed; but I do insist that in a legal election, fairly held according to law, and honestly and lawfully conducted, no doubtful interpretation of law or fact should defeat the will of the people, but that construction should be given which upholds the popular will. Take, for instance, the case of the democratic elector in Oregon. That State voted for the Hayes and Wheeler electors by a majority of about fifteen hundred votes. The people of Oregon declared in that election that they desired that the electoral votes of that State should be cast for General Hayes for President, and Mr. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States. Much could be said on both sides as to the result of the ineligibility of the postmaster selected as one of the electors; as to whether his resignation created a vacancy which might be filled by the other electors under the law of the State of Oregon; or whether his ineligibility was of such character that he could not be elected to the office, so that a vacancy could not be created in his case. I do not question the honesty, the motives, or the patriotism of Oregon's governor, but had I been in his stead, and with my views in regard to the premises I have assumed, I should have held so as to give force to the spirit and intention of the general law; that there was a vacancy which could be filled, and thus have carried out the verdict of the people, who had been called on to determine the question. The other construction defeats the fundamental object of the election.

But let us go to a broader field. On the 7th of last November, a majority of the people of the United States, amounting to two hundred and forty-eight thousand or about that, counting the votes of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida as determined by the returning boards, declared that they desired that Samuel J. Tilden should be President of the United States, and Thomas A. Hendricks their Vice-President. Under our electoral system, it does not follow that these gentlemen have been elected to these offices, but in the determination of doubtful questions affecting the electoral vote, the doubt should weigh in favor of the voice of the majority. The apparent majorities in Louisiana and Florida, at all events, are in favor of Tilden and Hendricks, but their returning boards have adjudged illegalities in the votes of these States sufficient to reverse the majorities in those States. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said to us the other day, speaking of the returning board of Louisiana:

> The members of the returning board are just as much officers in the performance of a limited judicial duty as your Supreme Court is in a broader one, just as much as a justice of the peace is. The judicial powers and duties of that tribunal must be respected by the tribunals of the United States. The Constitution of the United States declares that the electors shall be elected according to the laws of the States. It is Louisiana that says how her electors shall be elected; it is Texas that says how hers shall be elected; it is Ohio that says how hers shall be elected. The United States have no power to interfere with their laws. Their laws and their tribunals, their mode of returning and contesting, have to be regarded. It is by their laws that this case must be decided, and by the laws of Louisiana this returning board is required to pass upon these returns. It has done so, and I feel bound as a man who saw them do it, who witnessed their proceedings, to say that they did it in a manner to demand and require of you the same respect for their decision as would be given to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Their decision is final, made so by the law of Louisiana and by the supreme law of the land.

Now, if all this be true of Louisiana and its returning board, it is equally true that it is Oregon that says how her electors shall be elected. The United States have no power to interfere with her laws. Her laws and her tribunals, her mode of returning and contesting, have to be regarded. It is by her laws this case must be decided, and by the laws of Oregon—

> The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

The returns must be transmitted to the secretary of state, at the seat of Government, and it is made the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to canvass the votes, and then the governor must certify as before stated. In other words, the laws of Oregon constitute the secretary of state and governor its returning board. It is by the laws of Oregon this case must be decided, and by the laws of Oregon the secretary of state and governor are required to pass upon these returns. They have done so, and we are bound to give their decision the same respect that would be given the Supreme Court of the United States. Their decision is final according to the law of Oregon and the supreme law of the land. We cannot go back of it to see whether it was properly made or not. If the governor of Oregon certified that Cronin was elected, his decision is final as a judgment given by the Supreme Court. We must take it as true. This must be so, if the position assumed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] be true. And equally true must be the converse of the proposition. If we may go behind the certificate of the governor of Oregon and review and change his decision, we may, in a like manner, go behind the certificates of the returning board in Louisiana and review and determine the merits of its decision. Both reverse apparent majorities, and each has the same dignity and force in this respect. But, sir, it seems to me that we should take a broader view of the subject. In each case the tribunal has decided in favor of its own political party, and in doing so has changed majorities—reversed them, and these changes meet party necessities in the hour of party extremity. In neither case did the opposite party have counsel or representation. Each tribunal was partisan and decided in favor of its party, when each understood that its party triumph could not be assured without the decision it has given should be made. The country will never have confidence in either. Our Government is weak indeed, if its administration is to be chosen by the action of returning boards or governors against the will of the people. It is weak indeed, if we may not go behind the fraudulent decision of a returning board or governor and must accept it as final, though we may know it was erroneous or corrupt, and thus allow the will of the people to be thwarted. Such a proposition is an admission that our Government is not strong enough to protect and defend the privileges and franchises of freemen and our public liberty.

I have said that I did not agree with the determination of Cronin's case by the governor of Oregon. Far more reprehensible do I esteem the action of the returning boards of South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida. It will not do to let these or either of these defeat the will of the majority of forty millions of people, by mistake, erroneous proceedings, or fraud. Notwithstanding the eulogies we now hear pronounced over the Louisiana returning board, it would seem that the President was in want of confidence in it, as well as in those in South Carolina and Florida; for though the election was a State matter with which Congress or the President had nothing to do, notwithstanding as asserted by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] "it is Louisiana that says how her electors shall be elected, * * * and the United States have no power to interfere with her laws," and, as a consequence, with her count of the vote under these laws, yet the President of the United States called upon several of the most distinguished members of the republican party to go and watch the count of the votes by this board, and see that there was a fair count of the votes cast; and these gentlemen felt that it was best that the count made by these gentlemen should be watched, for they did go as the President requested, though there was no official or other compulsory obligation on them to do so. The manner of the count and its results excite suspicion, for, though the law requires the Louisiana board to be composed of men of both political parties, there was not a democrat upon the board. These boards managed also in all these States to count out by the most meager majorities generally all the democratic candidates for governor, and most of the democratic candidates for Congress. This is notably so in Florida. Now is it not remarkably strange that the points of intimidation should have been so conveniently situated so as to procure a successful count in favor of the republican party by republican returning boards? The circumstances are all suspicious, and I maintain that these boards are not so sacred, and their acts clothed with such final official sancity, that we may not lift the curtain and peep behind it to see what is there. But I do insist that if the doctrine of stare decisis is to control in the case of the certificates of these returning boards, it must also apply to the certificate of the governor of Oregon. The same reasons exist therefor save one, and that is the decision of one is the action of a republican tribunal and the other of a democratic one.

Eliza Pinkston has fearfully wrought up the feelings, the sympathies, the indignation of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] Her story does not make the impression on my mind it did on his, because I do not believe it; he does. The murder of the husband, the massacre of the helpless innocent babe, the character of the injuries to the woman are not the work of the white race or any other civilized race. They never occurred as detailed. I know nothing of the facts except as I have seen them in the papers; but I undertake to say that no white man was concerned in the outrages detailed by Eliza Pinkston. My friend from Ohio will learn that as a general proposition negro testimony is not of the highest character of credibility. It is no matter of surprise that this is so. The ancestors of this people were savages when brought to our shores. Their descendants were born in slavery. The school-house was shut against them. The law was violated in teaching them to read and write. Slavery and ignorance demoralize the slave. Their associations were with their own race, and even the free colored man was not permitted to mingle with the slaves. Under such circumstances it was impossible that they should be the subjects of many refining influences, or that their moral perceptions should be clear and distinct. They were not to blame for all this; but the result was, as every one knows who understands the subject at all, that with most of them truth was not appreciated, chastity was held in little repute, and the obligations of an oath were not understood, for they were scarcely ever in courts or examined as witnesses. There are many and glorious exceptions to this statement; and since the emancipation of the colored race the evidence of a marked, I think I may say an astonishing, improvement in all these respects is most encouraging. But history and experience teach us that when a race or people have been demoralized by any cause, there are many of them who never can be recovered or elevated.

I beg to assure my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that there are not so large a number of banditti and savages among the white people of the South as he has been led to suppose by the testimony he heard before the Louisiana returning board. About the 1st of May, 1866, what was called the Memphis riots occurred. During the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress the House of Representatives appointed a select committee, with our present distinguished minister to the government of France at its head. This committee heard testimony detailing brutalities, outrages, and ferocities equal, or nearly so, to those detailed by Eliza Pinkston. Among the witnesses examined by that committee were Frances Thompson and Lucy Smith. By referring to the report of that committee (House Representatives Report No. 101, first session Thirty-ninth Congress) the testimony of Frances and Lucy may be found. According to Frances's story, she and Lucy lived together; seven Irishmen came to their house, insulted her and Lucy, beat and choked and robbed them, and four of the Irishmen outraged Frances's person, and three of them Lucy's. Lucy attempts the corroboration of Frances's testimony; says that she and Frances lived together; that she was seventeen years old; that but one Irishman violated her person. The next one said she was so near dead that he would have nothing to do with her, so he struck her a blow and left her. The impression this testimony made on the minds of that committee was as strong and vivid as that made by that of Eliza Pinkston on the judgment and feelings of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] On pages 13 and 14 of Mr. Washburne's report will be found what he says on the subject. He tells us that—

> The colored girl, Lucy Smith, who was before the committee, said to be sixteen or seventeen years old, but who seemed from her appearance to be two or three years younger, was a girl of modest demeanor and highly respectable in appearance.

He speaks of Frances thus:

> She had been a slave, was a cripple using crutches, having a cancer on her foot.

So atrocious was the story of these wrongs that the blood of Mr. Washburne boiled over at the horror of its details, as did that of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] over Eliza Pinkston's, and he tells with a burst of righteous indignation, that—

> It is a singular fact that while this mob was breathing vengeance against the negroes, and shooting them down like dogs, yet when they found unprotected colored women they at once "conquered their prejudices," and proceeded to violate them under circumstances of the most licentious brutality.

That committee believed, honestly believed, all this was done. Frances Thompson some years after was arrested for violation of the law, and upon examination of the case it was discovered that Frances was a man, a fact no doubt known all the while to Frances's bedfellow, the young, modest, and "highly respectable" Lucy Smith. The testimony of these witnesses was utterly and necessarily untrue, and so is that of Eliza Pinkston, as is most apparent from its face. She says that she had her baby in her arms; that some of the men laid its little head upon her arm and cut its throat, and then they went to cutting her; they shot her twice, once in the throat and once in the leg. This was all done in the house. They then got her out of doors, and cut her jaw into the jaw-bone, and cut her throat. They then got the axe which she chopped wood with, and struck her a blow on the head with it with such violence that it broke the iron axe just at the eye. They cut her headstrings off. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says they hamstrung her and violated her person. Here was this woman, shot in the breast and leg, with her throat and jaw and headstrings cut, stricken on the head with an axe with such force that the axe was broken, hamstrung, and violated, who was able to get over into the cotton-field, and thence to Mr. Tidwell's house, and then to Epsy Williams, and then to Miraud Gates's, where she staid a few days. How far these places were apart she does not tell us. A salamander is nothing to Eliza. She tells us that they left Henry Pinkston unburied, and her for dead, and yet they took the body of the dead child a quarter of a mile away and threw it into a lake. And on this testimony, the falsehood of which is so apparent on its face, a State is to be disfranchised and a President whom the people never elected is to be placed in office. My friend from Ohio lets his heart runaway with his head in giving credence to Eliza's story. The brutal treatment of the husband, the murder of the child, and the injuries to Eliza were not the deeds of white men or any other race. I do not believe they occurred as detailed. And, sir, these darkest deeds are done, we are told, in a State which is under republican control, and no warrants issued, offenders arrested, and no efforts made to punish the guilty monsters.

Before southern States and people are held guilty of such gross outrages there ought to be a sufficient amount of kinship between the sections not to allow each other to be convicted of the most fiendish crimes on such false and unreasonable testimony. It would be better to hold that all presumptions of crime are against the southern people, and that they are conclusive. O, sir, it is time that we become infused with more of that charity which "thinketh no evil and is kind;" it is time that we should have that confidence which would allow us to repose trust in each other. It is time for us to make our Government one of law instead of force. It is time that offenders should be tried and punished and not those who are innocent. The wicked should be condemned and not communities or States because wicked men are in them. If a people lose confidence in the good faith and justice of their government or the government lose confidence in its people, there will in such a country soon be an end of liberty and free institutions. Before the people of my own State in the canvass lately ended I on all occasions indorsed the candidates of the republican party for President and Vice-President as patriotic and honest men, of whom any party or country might be justly proud. I supported Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks because I thought them in every way worthy for the high offices to which they aspired. My opinion of none of them has changed. None of them desire the offices for which they were supported against the will of the people as expressed under the methods provided by law. We must be actuated by the same spirit. We must settle this question in some fair, just, and honorable mode, at once peaceful and conciliatory. The peace, the harmony, the liberty of the people are of far greater importance than the question as to who shall be the occupant of the presidential chair. Success should be sought only on the merits of the case. Neither party should seek the advantage under technical theories or by force of physical power, but the right should be reached by honest, non-partisan, and peaceful methods and the country, the whole country, be uppermost in all minds and hearts.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee simply one question. I have no desire at this time to reply to his argument; but I ask him if he believes that the outrages committed on Mrs. Finkston must have been committed by black men because of the revolting and atrocious character of the outrage committed?

Mr. KEY. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I did not say they were committed by black men. I said they were committed by savages, or those who had the instincts of savages. I did not say they were committed by white men or committed by black men. The expression I used was "savages, or those who had the instincts of savages."

Mr. BRUCE. Then I misunderstood the Senator, and I beg his pardon; but I wish to ask him if it is proved conclusively to his mind that those outrages were not committed by white men? I think the Senator has read the report of the outrages committed at Coushatta, at Grant, and Colfax Parishes, and I ask if he really believes that those outrages were committed by other than white men? I do not assert that white men would commit outrages that black men would not commit; I do not hold that black men are better than white men; and, while I have no wish to discuss this matter this morning, I am somewhat surprised at the Senator from Tennessee when he casts a gross reflection upon a race that certainly does not deserve his censure.

Mr. KEY. The Senator is mistaken in what I did say, as I have remarked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] desires to be heard on this question and that he is indisposed to-day and cannot be present. I suggest, therefore, that it would hardly be proper to take the vote at this time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not desire the vote to be taken until the Senator from Illinois can be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the resolution will be laid aside informally. The Chair hears no objection to that course being taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4207) to remove the political disabilities of F. E. Shepperd, of Virginia.

DEATH OF SPEAKER KERR.

The message also communicated the following resolutions, which had been passed by the House:

Resolved, That the sad announcement of the death of Michael C. Kerr, late member from the State of Indiana and Speaker of this House, is received by us in the deepest sorrow and profoundest regret, and that in his untimely decease the House of Representatives of the United States has lost an impartial, competent, and noble presiding officer, a faithful and patriotic member.

Resolved, That in testimony of our respect for the memory of the deceased Speaker, his chair be draped in mourning during the unfinished term of the Forty-fourth Congress, and, as a further evidence of our continuing esteem for the dead, the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That the Senate be informed of the death of the late Speaker by forwarding to that body a copy of these resolutions, and that the Clerk transmit a copy of the same to the afflicted family of the illustrious dead.

Mr. MORTON. In reference to the obsequies of the late Speaker of the House, regarding which we have just received the resolutions of the House, I beg leave to say that my colleague, [Mr. MCDONALD,] a long personal friend of the late Speaker, Mr. Kerr, is absent on duty, and it would be agreeable to his wishes as well as to mine and to the friends of the deceased that this matter should lie upon the table until the return of my colleague, and then a time will be fixed when it will be taken up in the Senate. I therefore ask to have the resolutions lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will lie on the table.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules on the revision of the rules. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that at the last session a resolution was passed instructing the Chief Clerk to prepare a new Manual, and it was thought advisable that the new Manual should include the new rules, if they should be adopted by the Senate. The Senators are well aware that the present edition of the Manual is so far exhausted that all Senators have not been supplied. The new Senators who have been lately sworn in have no copies and many of the senior Senators have none. In order to meet that, as well as to perfect our rules, I ask that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of that report.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, I take it, knows that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is not present; but he knows best whether the Senator from North Carolina ought to be or intended to be here when these rules are considered.

Mr. FERRY. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from North Carolina, a member of the Committee on Rules, is absent. The Senator from North Carolina understood that if there was an opportunity I would endeavor to call up the report, and it is with his assent that I do so. The report is the unanimous report of the committee, and I call it up simply to avail myself of an opportunity when I see the Senate is not particularly engaged, that the subject may be acted upon before the recess, in order that we may have these rules, if adopted, placed in the hands of the Chief Clerk, that he may incorporate them in his Manual.

Mr. CONKLING. To avoid the necessity of asking to have read enough of this report to enable us to understand what it is, I ask the Senator from Michigan to state sufficiently to denote to us the rules in which changes have been made, indicating in such general terms as he no doubt conveniently can what these changes are.

Mr. FERRY. There are but very few of the rules that have been changed. Substantially there is but very little difference between the present report and the current rules of the Senate. In one particular the rule is changed in regard to the attendance of Senators. We have heretofore found difficulty when without a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should like to ask if these rules have been printed?

Mr. FERRY. They have been printed; they were printed at the last session. The present rule as reported by the committee gives the Senate the power to compel the attendance of Senators. In that respect, and in that only, does the new rule on that subject differ. Then, in relation to the relevancy of amendments to appropriation bills, we have found the difficulty of settling the relevancy of amendments, and the present report provides that the question of entertaining such amendments shall be submitted to the Senate instead of being decided by the Chair. All the other subjects that might be considered materially different between this report and the present rules consist in bringing the practice of the Senate into the form of rules. It is well known to all Senators that there are many decisions based upon the practice of the Senate, and we find a great deal of difficulty when a question comes up if there is no rule for it. We have to adhere to the practice of the Senate, and the practice is not so familiar to Senators as the rules because those decisions are not before them so much. The report covers that practice and reduces it to form, and in that respect it differs from the present rules of the Senate. I think if the Senate should take up the rules and proceed with their consideration, I have notes here by which I can show Senators, if need be, where the present report differs from the rules of the Senate as contained in the Manual.

Mr. DAVIS. May I ask the Senator whether I understood him aright to say that the report was unanimous, and that the Senator from North Carolina agreed with him as to these changes?

Mr. FERRY. He did; the Senator is correct. I would also state that the committee have given a great deal of attention to this matter. I might revert to the fact that the present report has reclassified the rules, placing them under their various subjects; and in that respect it would be a great advantage, if in no other, as will readily be seen by reference to the report. The report is printed; it was printed at the last session, and can be laid upon the tables of Senators, or probably it is there now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion to take up the report of the Committee on Rules for present consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I now ask that the report be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and that the rules be taken up seriatim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued if there be no objection. The first rule reported will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

QUORUM—READING THE JOURNAL.

1. The presiding officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall then be read, and any mistake made in the entries may be corrected.

Mr. FERRY. If the Clerk will allow me to interrupt him at this moment, I wish to state the difference between this and the present rule, and Senators will see the force of the change. The present rule reads—

To the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall be made in the entries.

That is, that you shall correct errors that shall be made in the future, "shall be made in the entries." We provide that "any mistake made in the entries may be corrected," applying to the past. That is all the difference between the present report and the old rule. What follows of rule first is new matter.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of Rule 1, as follows:

The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question, and proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. That is merely bringing the practice down into a rule. I think there can be no objection to that.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to inquire what has become of the resolution of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FERRY. It was informally laid aside for the purpose of considering this report.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to know whether it was laid aside until to-morrow, or whether it is likely to be called up at any time to-day. If it lies over until to-morrow, which I presume was the intention of the Senator from Oregon, I shall know how to govern myself, as I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution. I understand the resolution lies over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was laid aside in consequence of the illness of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who will not be present to-day.

Mr. BOGY. So that, of course, it will lie over until to-morrow. I so understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take it to be the pleasure of the Senate that unless objection is made each rule as it is read, thus presented as an amendment to the existing rules, is assented to. The first rule will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are we in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. FERRY. Yes, sir. The rules will be reported to the Senate hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right, then.

Mr. FERRY. I will now state for the information of the Senate that rule second is new matter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WHEN A QUORUM IS NOT PRESENT.

2. If either at the commencement of any daily session of the Senate, or at any time during its daily sessions, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll of Senators, and shall announce the result to the Senate; and these proceedings shall be without debate.

Mr. FERRY. This has been the practice of the Senate. It is really reducing the practice to form. We have hitherto had no rule that controlled it.

Mr. HAMLIN. In this connection I want to say to the Senate that, while I was one of the committee which aided in preparing these rules, I did not deem it advisable to press upon the consideration of that committee an amendment to this rule, which I think, after we shall have gone through it in Committee of the Whole, I shall offer; and I make the statement now for the purpose of asking the consideration of Senators to the point. It is an amendment which will authorize a less number than a quorum, when the Senate shall be found in that condition, to compel the attendance of absent Senators. The rule which has always existed has been based upon the supposition that absent Senators if notified will appear; while you and I, sir, know that the rule has been, if not "more honor'd in the breach than the observance," often dishonored in the breach; and I believe the time has come when the same power should be vested in a number less than a quorum here that is vested by the rules of the House in a number less than a quorum there. We often find ourselves at midnight, or even at a later hour, without a quorum of members present. The majority of that number present are seeking to accomplish an object. We do know, and now I speak as an individual, who are not present and ought to be; and legislation is thus defeated. I think there ought to be an absolute power provided by rule to allow the Senators present, being less than a quorum, to compel the attendance of absent Senators; and I think I will offer an amendment at the proper time to that effect.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to call the attention of my colleague on the committee to Rule 3, where he will see, I think, that that case is covered, if I understand him correctly; but I may have misunderstood him. It provides that a majority of Senators present may compel the attendance of Senators.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was not aware that it was put in.

Mr. FERRY. It covers the question, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. Why did the committee omit the definition of "quorum" contained in the second clause of the first rule as it now stands?

Mr. HAMLIN. The Constitution does that.

Mr. FERRY. It is in the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the second rule will be considered as agreed to and the third rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ABSENT SENATORS SENT FOR TO MAKE A QUORUM.

3. No Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave first obtained. Whenever it shall be ascertained that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and, pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no motion, except a motion to adjourn, nor debate, shall be in order; and all proceedings under this rule shall cease upon an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This rule will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection, and the fourth rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE TO BE CHOSEN.

4. In the absence of the Vice-President, the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore, and the presiding officer shall have the right to name a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair; but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

The Chief Clerk next read as follows:

MAKING UP THE JOURNAL.

5. The proceedings of the Senate shall, briefly and accurately, be stated on the Journal. Messages of the President, in full; titles of bills and joint resolutions, and such parts as shall be affected by proposed amendments; every vote, and a brief statement of the contents of each petition, memorial, or paper presented to the Senate, shall be entered.

The Chief Clerk read next as follows:

SEPARATE JOURNALS TO BE KEPT.

6. The legislative proceedings, the executive proceedings, the confidential legislative proceedings, and the proceedings when sitting as a court of impeachment, of the Senate, shall each be recorded in a separate book.

Mr. FERRY. The next rule is a new one.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PRESENTATION OF CREDENTIALS.

7. The presentation of the credentials of Senators-elect and other questions of privilege shall always be in order, except during the reading and correction of the Journal, while a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and all questions and motions arising or made upon the presentation of such credentials shall be proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, this rule will be considered as agreed to and the eighth rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Morning hour.

8. One hour next after the reading of the Journal shall be designated as the morning hour, during which the order of business shall be as follows:

First. The presiding officer shall lay before the Senate messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the Senate; and such bills, joint resolutions, and other messages from the House of Representatives as may remain upon his table from any previous day's session undisposed of.

Second. The presiding officer shall then call for, in the following order:

The presentation of petitions and memorials.

Reports of the standing and select committees.

The introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Concurrent and other resolutions.

Until the business of the morning hour shall have been concluded and so announced from the Chair, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the Calendar shall be entertained by the Chair, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given, the motion shall not be open to amendment and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up; nor shall the consideration of any subject taken up during the morning hour, except a motion to amend the Journal, or a motion pertaining to the credentials of a Senator-elect or his admission to his seat, be extended, unless by unanimous consent, beyond the expiration of the morning hour.

If any portion of the morning hour shall remain after the call for resolutions, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate, in their order, resolutions and concurrent resolutions introduced on any prior day, and the same shall be proceeded with, but not beyond the expiration of the morning hour, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to propose an amendment from the committee, and that is to insert after the word "after" in the first line of this rule the words "and including," so that it may include the Journal and not have the morning hour fluctuate with the length of time required for the reading of the Journal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule, as amended, will be agreed to, no objection being made, and rule ninth will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

9. Immediately upon the expiration of the morning hour, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate the unfinished business at its last adjournment, which shall take precedence of the special orders, and shall be proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

The Chief Clerk next read as follows:

CALENDAR OF GENERAL ORDERS.

10. At the expiration of the morning hour, if there shall be neither unfinished business nor special order, the Senate shall proceed with the Calendar of General Orders, unless it shall otherwise determine; and the subjects upon the Calendar of General Orders shall be taken up in the order in which they stand, and, if not finally disposed of, shall retain their respective positions on said Calendar until such final disposition. And in all cases where the Senate shall take up the Calendar of General Orders, and shall not have gone through therewith, when the same shall be resumed, it shall be at the point which was reached when last under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, this rule will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. As this rule has been agreed to, I ask that it be transposed to follow Rule 13. The rule as to "general orders" should follow the rule as to "special orders." Then they will be in this order: first the unfinished business, next the special order, and then the general orders. This should be Rule 13 instead of 10. It simply regards the order of arrangement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that this report is being read now as any bill, and that it may be committed or amended after we shall finish the reading. I believe that I am correct in that view.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is in committee now, and will be passed upon again.

Mr. FERRY. I understand that it is in Committee of the Whole, and we are now passing upon each rule and making amendments, and then the whole body of rules will have to come into the Senate subject to control as usual in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SPECIAL ORDERS.

11. Any subject or matter may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the hour fixed for the consideration of a special order shall arrive, it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to lay such special order before the Senate, unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day, in which case the unfinished business shall have precedence.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that a change in the existing rule? I wish the honorable Senator who has this matter in charge whenever he comes to a point in which there has been an alteration in the rules would indicate the extent of the alteration and the effect.

Mr. FERRY. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that this is the language of the present rule:

No bill, joint resolution, or other subject shall be made a special order for a particular day and hour without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present.

It is simply a change in phraseology.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the number of that rule?

Mr. FERRY. The number of that rule is 31 in the present Manual.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have no objection to this particular rule. I rise, however, to remark that it is quite out of the question that the Senate this morning shall render any essential aid to the Senator having this matter in charge in considering these rules. In one sense the report is accessible; I have it in my hand. It does not indicate at all the changes which have been made; it is printed here as a novelty, entire, by itself. The rules are recast as to their order, as the Senator says, classified; so that a Senator with the Manual before him cannot make the comparison. We have now before us an instance of it. Here is Rule 13 of this revision. You turn to the corresponding rule in the Manual and it turns out to be Rule 31; and the Senator from Delaware adds that Rule 11 refers to a rule far succeeding that number. I suggest that if we are to do this intelligently at all, or intelligibly at all, accurately speaking, we must do one of two things: the Senator from Michigan must state in respect of these rules exactly what the proposed change is, or else this report must be printed, as it seems to me it ought to have been printed originally, showing the amendments, so that by looking at the paper you may see the changes that have been made; but to go on and read these separately gives no light whatever. We might just as well adopt them in a lot. I have great confidence myself in the Committee on Rules; but I submit that these rules ought either to be reprinted, putting in brackets or italics the matter added or the matter stricken out, and referring to the present rules, and then giving notice of the day when the matter shall be taken up and considered, so that Senators may possess themselves of it; or else the Senator ought in each case to state whether the rule remains the same or not, and, if a change has occurred, state, as the fuller material before him no doubt will enable him to do, just what the change is.

Mr. FERRY. I stated when the report was taken up that I had notations here of the differences between the present report and the rules as they now exist in the Manual adopted by the Senate; and I am prepared to give the changes. At the same time, if the Senator from New York or the Senate desire to have the rules reprinted and put in the form which he proposes, it might be a more intelligent way of reaching the object. This matter has been before the Senate ever since last session. The revision was printed then and distributed; and my object in calling it up now was to facilitate the completion of the Manual. But if we can arrive at a conclusion more intelligently and accurately by having it reprinted and the changes put in italics, I am disposed very readily to yield to that method or any other that will reach the end.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will not interpose such suggestion unless some other Senator does, as I have already intimated that I have great confidence in the Committee on Rules and certainly no wish to add to their annoyance or trouble in making any compilation of the rules which we have. I shall be quite satisfied if the Senator will take the trouble, in the case of each rule read, to indicate to us the change that has been made, if any, and if so the nature of that change. Further than that, I will not ask him to go; but I should like as one member of the Senate to understand the subject intelligently.

Mr. FERRY. I would be glad to do that, Mr. President.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that I am very strongly impressed with the idea that we shall make more progress if we adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from New York. Indeed I supposed the rules when printed for our consideration would show in the imprint the precise pages that were amended. I thought they would be so printed. The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] not now in his place, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] and myself constitute this Committee on Rules, as the Senate know. We have devoted to this subject a very great deal of attention. I cannot say how many meetings we had, but I think we had twenty on this subject. We took the rules and we considered them rule by rule, line by line, sentence by sentence. We sought first to classify them so that they would be grouped in their appropriate manner. We sought to strike out that which was somewhat ambiguous and make the language of each rule plain, conforming to what was the practice of the Senate. We sought to incorporate a few new rules which would carry out the uniform practice of the Senate that had been had without rules; and I may say that when we got through we were unanimous in our opinion. I am quite sure that we have made some improvements, and yet the changes cannot be as familiar to Senators as to the committee who have examined the subject, and I am inclined to the opinion, and I am going to make the suggestion directly to the chairman, that if we reprint so that a Senator shall see right before him whether any rule is changed at all, if changed how changed, or if a rule be a new one what practice of the Senate it covers, if a rule has been modified how modified—I think if we have that in print for each Senator we shall make more progress than we shall by acting on the mere suggestion of the Senator who is so familiar with them. The chairman of the committee will state precisely, and yet that will not be as satisfactory to the Senate or to Senators as if they have the whole matter precisely before their own eye in print.

I therefore suggest to the chairman, and I think it will help forward the matter, to have this report reprinted with all the changes, showing precisely what they are. I thought it was so printed. I did make that precise suggestion in committee myself, and when I took the report up this morning I supposed I should find it just in the shape that I suggest now it ought to be.

Mr. DAVIS. I am disposed to add a word to what has been so well said by the Senators from New York and Maine. I fully concur in their opinion. I endeavored to follow the Clerk as he read the rules to find what the changes were, but like the Senator from New York and the Senator from Delaware it was impossible for me to do so from the fact that some of the rules were changed perhaps as much as four or five or six pages from one another.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator will pardon me, he will see in a moment how this became necessary. We classified them and if any old rule was not in its proper place we transferred it to another place.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to make another suggestion to the Senator from West Virginia before he takes his seat, which is that many of the old rules are made up to cover several subjects, and in the reclassification they have been distributed to their proper places, therefore dividing up and distributing the rules, so that in the case of a rule in the Manual it may be distributed into two or three other rules, and for that reason the Senator will see the difficulty of quoting the rule from which one of these is taken, because there may be more of that rule, or the present rule may include more than the corresponding rule in this revision. I had taken the pains to note the difference in each particular wherever there was a change; I have it here in the margin.

Mr. DAVIS. I notice that some of the rules which the Senate has been acting under, perhaps from the beginning of the present form of government, are changed. That is very important; so much so that I think we ought to see these proposed changes in print and have an opportunity of examining them before the Senate acts upon this report. I hope the suggestion of the Senators from New York and Maine will be adopted, and that the chairman will have printed his marginal notes so that each Senator may see for himself just what the changes are and where they will lead us to. As I said a moment ago, the report changes some of the rules, some of the practices of the Senate that have been in force since the present form of government, and we certainly ought to go slowly before we make radical changes in rules which have stood so long and which have answered our purpose up to the present time. I believe that many of the changes that have been indicated by the new rules are proper and ought to be adopted, but we ought to know what we are doing. I hope, therefore, that the suggestion coming from the other Senators will be adopted and that there will be a reprint indicating such changes as have been made and including the marginal notes which the chairman of the Committee on Rules has before him. He can make his own notes and prepare them in such a way that the proposed rules may be printed in that shape.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not regard this subject as of the slightest importance or consequence, for rules are never observed in this body; they are only made to be broken. We are a law unto ourselves, and it is entirely immaterial in my judgment whether we have a code of rules or not. But I do not agree with the Senator from Maine that this subject will be better treated by being postponed. If we are to consider it at all there is no better time than now. We have an unoccupied afternoon that certainly cannot be more innocently employed than in the discussion of these rules that are never to be observed, and I am entirely willing to take the action of the committee on trust. A resolution has already been offered for an adjournment over the holidays, and a postponement now would probably result in a delay of this question until after the beginning of the new year. Every Senator knows that subjects of much greater magnitude and importance will soon press upon our attention, and if we are to have any action at all, it had better be had now. As some Senator has observed, there is a great necessity for a reprint of the Manual. It was ordered at the last session of Congress and has been postponed, as I understand, until the present time for the purpose of enabling the Chief Clerk to incorporate into it the present body of rules reported from the committee. The inconvenience resulting to Senators from the want of that Manual has already been very great, and I would suggest that we had better continue this afternoon, taking the statement of the committee on trust, believing them to be entirely accurate, and finish this matter.

Mr. THURMAN. The fact stated by the Senator from Kansas that the rules are very little observed in the Senate is the best proof I know of two things: first, of the inutility of the rules and, second, of the good behavior of Senators; and these two facts show that this matter may be well laid over without any detriment to the public service or to the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. We want the Manual.

Mr. THURMAN. That is true; but we can get along without the Manual well enough, and would get along if there were no Manual. I am not afraid to trust the action of seventy-four gentlemen on this floor. I agree with the Senator that very little attention has been paid to the strict rules of the Senate, and yet I can say here, after nearly eight years' service, that I do not know of a single act of injustice to any Senator, on this floor by the enforcement of any rule or by the omission of the enforcement of any rule. But if we are to have any change in the rules, as some Senators think we ought to have, let us know what we are about, let us have a print of the rules with the proposed amendments, and then every Senator can judge for himself as to the propriety of the proposed alterations. I do not think we ought to hurry this thing through in the way suggested by the Senator from Kansas without actually knowing what are the changes proposed. I hope, therefore, that the suggestions that have been made by the Senator from New York, the Senator from Maine, and the Senator from West Virginia will be followed, and that this matter will be laid over until the rules can be printed in the manner proposed, so that the suggested alterations will be accessible.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I will make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio directly and to the Senate, that we go through with the rules, as the committee have two or three modifications to make, and then have them reported to the Senate and printed, according to the suggestion of the Senator from New York, that the modifications shall be in italics or in some form that shall be plain to all the Senators.

I wish to state in this connection, verifying what has been stated by my colleague on the committee, that the Committee on Rules have given a great deal of time and attention to these rules. They spent all the leisure of last session; whenever it was possible for them to meet consistent with other duties they met and devoted their time to the perfection of these rules. So far as the classification is concerned, which appears so apparent to Senators, I think it is pretty generally conceded that it is a great convenience and in that respect it would be a great object to have them adopted and become a part of our Manual.

So far as the modification of the rules is concerned, I stated at the outset there is no substantial difference; that this is merely bringing into form what has been the practice of the Senate. We have labored under a great difficulty whenever questions of order have arisen; we have frequently referred to the practice of the Senate rather than to the rules. Practice of course becomes rule; but yet there is such ambiguity and such uncertainty in the minds of Senators where they are guided by their recollections rather than by the form of the rule lying before them, that in order to obviate that the committee desired to put into form that practice, so that we should have the rules plain and explicit and be governed hereafter by them.

Now, if there be no objection, I will suggest that we go through with these rules and make the modifications that the committee propose, agree to the little transpositions they would make of one or two rules; then let them be reported to the Senate and ordered to be printed in the form suggested by the Senator from New York and reiterated by the Senator from Ohio. In that way we shall have made progress, and I am exceedingly desirous that this thing should be done. We are going into a recess by which we shall lose a couple of weeks so far as business is concerned. If we do this much we can have our work printed, and then if we are prepared before the recess we can take it up; if not, it will be ready to be taken up at the resumption of the session. I trust that so much will be done to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Rules whether or not, if his plan be adopted, we gain anything? The Senate will not be prepared to take up and pass upon the new rules without seeing what they are. When they are called up again they will have to be reread, and therefore there will be nothing gained by going on now. No Senator, no matter how desirous of following the Clerk through the reading now, can tell what the changes are without explanation from the Senator who has charge of the subject. I see nothing to be gained by going on to-day. We listen to the reading to be sure. If the object is not to read them when we take up these rules again, then we should gain, but the gain I think would be in the wrong direction. I suggest to the Senator in charge whether I am not correct in that position. I cannot see how the business will be forwarded if we are to read the rules again when they are taken up; and if they are not to be read then, the Senate must act upon them without reading them at the time when action is taken.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from West Virginia that we shall gain this much: If we print the amendments in italics and the Senator has a rest of some two weeks, and that is before him, he will be prepared when he comes back here, as his colleagues will be, to adopt the amendments, if they suit them, without the formal reading of the whole rules. The question will then be on the adoption of the amendments as they appear in the italics. Therefore we shall have gained that much time.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRY. I will.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator propose that we shall go through with the rules to-day and then have them printed? What is meant by going through the rules? Does he mean that we are to go through and adopt them, or just have them read? If we are to go through and adopt them, then there is no use of talking about correcting them afterward.

Mr. FERRY. We are in Committee of the Whole. I suppose we have two stages. We report from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, and then the report will be open to amendment on the question of concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose you want to reconsider, then you must reconsider the vote reporting the measure to the Senate, and get it back into Committee of the Whole to act on it. If you do not want to reconsider, you will not save any time.

Mr. FERRY. The question will be on concurring in the amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. But practically there can be no time saved. If the Senate is agreed, as I hope the Senate will be, in the main at all events, to these propositions, considering them will be merely to read them in Committee of the Whole, and they will be assented to. If you assume that will not be so, it is because discussion, difference of opinion is to arise. In the last event, by reporting them to the Senate you simply put one additional impediment in the way; then you will have to reconsider and go back; whereas if the Senator thinks, as the Senator from Maine suggested, that it will be convenient and suitable that Senators have an opportunity before they vote to advise themselves what the changes are, manifestly I submit to the Senator from Michigan the economical way in respect of time is to have this printed now before it goes further, to the end that in place of retracing our steps one single going through may do. So it occurs to me.

Mr. FERRY. I may be somewhat obtuse, but I cannot see the point the Senator from New York makes. If we go through and adopt these rules, when they are reported to the Senate the question will be on concurring in these amendments. I do not see how the question of reconsideration can apply when the question will be upon concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. It will not be unless you want to go back for a general revision. Here you strike out certain matters in Committee of the Whole. It will be in order to concur or non-concur in that. But suppose you want to change it, suppose you want to put back what has been stricken out, suppose you want to make some of the various motions which cannot be made in the Senate and which can be made in Committee of the Whole, then the only way is to reconsider and go back. If no such thing arises, you lose no time by letting it stand as it is, provided always you are going to wait for the reprint and allow Senators to understand and exercise their judgment upon it. I have no choice myself as to the mode; but I suggest to the Senator that if he thinks the suggestion of weight enough to induce him to reprint these rules, then the simple way is to reprint them at the point where we are, to the end that we may act advisedly all the way, and not be called upon to retrace our steps or get into any jangle as to what has been or has not been agreed on and what may or may not be changed.

Mr. FERRY. I have no desire to get into any jangle. I am seeking the interest of the Senate and its good order, and it is for that reason I am representing the Committee on Rules in this report. I supposed that there would be time gained by going through this report now and making the modifications the committee desire to make. I do not wish to be tenacious about this matter; I only desire to serve the best interests of this body. There are modifications which the committee desire to make and which should be included in the print. If the Senate have any confidence in the report of the committee, these modifications are also suggested by the committee and should go with the report so that all may be printed together. Now if there be no objection that informally the committee shall include these suggestions in the proposition to reprint and have them go together, I shall waive any preference that I may have, so far as I am concerned, and let it be done.

Mr. HAMLIN. We all agree to that.

Mr. FERRY. If there be no objection, then, I will ask that the report of the committee, with the modifications proposed, be printed, and that all the modifications be put in italics, or in such plain manner that the amendments made by the committee and the original rules will be easily distinguishable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And with references in the margin to the number of the old rule in each case.

Mr. FERRY. And, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, with references in the margin to the old rules, and to the several rules composing the rules now reported, where there is a consolidation.

Mr. CONKLING. And also with the little foot-notes printed with each rule in the Manual stating when it was adopted, and a reference to the other rules in the Manual relating to the same subject, which is perhaps a matter of adding one hundreds words in printing. Then we shall have the whole matter before us.

Mr. FERRY. Including the suggestion of the Senator from New York, which I suppose the Clerk has.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the suggestion which has been made that the consideration of these rules be postponed until after the recess, will not prevail. I think it quite desirable that the rules should be adopted now. We have been waiting for a year nearly to reprint the Manual, which is entirely out of print. The new Senators have no copies of it; the old Senators frequently require them for public purposes, and it is impossible to get them. I had occasion some time ago to try to get a Manual for a person whom the whole Senate would be very glad to oblige, and it was impossible to find one. We do not wish to reprint the Manual until we have the amended rules.

The Senator from Kansas very justly says the rules are not greatly observed, and it is very much to the credit of the Senate that they are not, because the rule of the Senate has been its own sense of propriety and dignity, and the rule that prevailed in this body, and I trust always will, has been the rule of courtesy. It is very seldom that the strict requirements of parliamentary law are enforced or are needed to be enforced here; but still we should have rules, and whenever they are necessary we should have them in the best form, in the form most acceptable to the Senate. Therefore the modification which has long been needed ought to be acted upon before the recess, that the Manual may be printed and may be laid upon our tables as soon after the recess as possible. If the rules are not adopted until after the recess, we shall not get the Manual probably until near the close of the session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not agreed to any recess yet.

Mr. ANTHONY. We shall have a recess practically whether we have one nominally or not. There will be no business done in this body next week, no matter whether we are formally in recess or whether we meet here and adjourn from day to day. For my own part, I would much rather sit here and transact the public business if it were possible; but long experience and repeated trials have shown me that it is entirely impossible to transact any business during the holidays.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to put in my distinct caveat to what has been said here on this floor, that we do not observe the rules of this body. I affirm that the rules of this body are our guide, and that we do observe them. It is true that, as the body is composed of different men at different times, you find, precisely as you find in your courts, now and then, a decision overruled; but we are a law-abiding body, and the law is the rule of the body.

I wish to say that I hope the simple motion to postpone and print will be made, without any limitation, and the reasons have been stated by the Senator from Rhode Island very clearly. A motion to postpone and print leaves it in our power to take up this report so soon as we can after it shall have been printed. That is the best form to leave it in, and I hope the Senator from Michigan will so make his motion, and I shall be very glad if the Senate will so agree to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I did understand from the chairman of the Committee on Rules by his nodding that he assented to the views of the Senator from New York as to references, &c., to the dates of the adoption of the former rules and other things——

Mr. FERRY. I stated that the reprint, as proposed by me, would include all that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FERRY. In a moment. I desire to say to the Senator from West Virginia that I stated that my motion included the proposition of the Senator from New York, and included the date of the passage of each rule as it now stands on our Manual. I believe that is the object the Senator has. I wish to state, in connection with that, that there will be no possibility of having this ready before the recess, if a recess is taken at the time suggested here this morning. So far as I am concerned, I am disposed to remain here, and expect to remain here and continue to transact the public business without a recess; but I am persuaded we shall have a recess, as we always do; or, if not, we shall find ourselves without a quorum, and be compelled to take a recess practically by doing no business day after day. I desire the Senate to understand that it will be impossible to arrange this report for the printer in time to have it printed for information before the recess, if a recess is taken this week.

Now, Mr. President, I move that the subject be postponed, and that the report of the committee with these modifications be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to postpone the consideration of the present report and that it shall be reprinted with all the modifications and notes that have been suggested by the Senator from Michigan and other Senators.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator from Michigan whether this is limited for the purpose of having the report now printed with references to the matter of the old rules by numbers, so that when we want to know in considering this question what changes and amendments have been made we shall find a reference in the report of the committee to the number of the rule under which the subject has been treated in our present compilation. I ask also whether it is to include the foot-notes of dates which are a historical record of the rules originally, and the various amendments to which they have been subjected, so that the report now to be furnished to us will present these facts. Unless it does, I fear that we shall scarcely be able, in the current examination of the report during the sessions of the Senate, to contrast the changes proposed by the committee now with the rules under which we have heretofore been acting so as to understand the scope and extent of the proposed amendments.

Mr. FERRY. I suppose the Senators understand thoroughly now the rules of the Senate as contained in the Manual which I hold in my hand. I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware to be that the print shall cover opposite each rule, or included in it, in different type the rules from which it is taken or with which it differs. I do not understand, however, that foot-notes, with a history of each original rule, are to be given, since the rules were adopted. The date of the passage of each rule, as contained in the Manual, and that I understand is to be included. The Senator will also see that some of these rules contain parts of two or three of the rules in the Manual, so that, in order to bring them into juxtaposition, you will have to bring the several rules or parts of the different rules opposite the one proposed to be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. There will be no difficulty, I suggest, where a rule now proposed is composed of two or more preceding rules—in other words, where there has been a consolidation of rules—in noting that fact at the foot of the report now made. Let me illustrate what I mean:

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. BAYARD. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask the Senator if he means simply to add what is in the Manual at the foot of each rule, to wit, the time when it was adopted, and if changed the time when changed?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no trouble in doing that.

Mr. FERRY. That has already been included.

Mr. BAYARD. It is that the historical notes which accompany the present Manual shall be carried into the new compilation; but there is also this: Take Rule 11 as reported by the committee; it relates to special orders. The corresponding number in our old rules to Rule 11 relates to precedence of motions when a question is under debate. In recasting the rules the numbers no longer consist. What I mean is that when the Senator brings this matter back for the consideration of the Senate, we shall be enabled by glancing at the report to find a reference to the present rule as now numbered, so that we can observe the new treatment of the subject-matter to which the rule relates, and with that also will come the matter referred to by the honorable Senator from Maine that these foot-notes contained in our present compilation giving the history of the origination of each rule and its amendment may be continued in the new publication.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Delaware, I think, has misapprehended the rule in the Manual to which Rule 11 of the report refers. It refers to Rule 31 in the Manual, both referring to special orders. I have the reference in the margin.

Mr. BAYARD. That is true, but the rule as to special orders is numbered 31 in the present Manual; it is numbered 11 in the report now made. I merely wish the new report to make reference to the old rules, so that in comparing the two we may see what changes have occurred, and may be able readily to understand it.

Mr. FERRY. That I understand to be done. Now I move that the report be recommitted and printed with the notations as suggested by the several Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators have heard the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

GIBBES & CO.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 946. It is a private bill to which I do not think there will be objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let it be subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 946) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $4,045.11, being a balance due Gibbes & Co. on account of money deposited by them with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is a report that I have here, and it can be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. WRIGHT from the Committee on Claims on the 19th of July last:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 946) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina, submit the following report:

The facts in relation to this claim, furnished, at the request of your committee, in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 10, 1876, are as follows:

"Late in the year 1865 certain cottons in Augusta, Georgia, were seized or detained by Treasury agents as confederate or blockade cottons. They were claimed by Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, as being in part their property, and in part the property of certain English firms, of whom they were the agents. Upon evidence produced by the claimants the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 27th of February, 1866, directed that the cottons be restored to them upon their payment to the United States of all costs, charges, and expenses paid or incurred by Treasury agents in connection with the cottons restored.

"The amount so paid as charges was principally due to Savary & Co., who were engaged in putting in order Government cottons and in transporting and shipping the same. The amount of their bill for expenses, &c., on the Gibbes & Co. cotton, $44,217.48, was deposited by Gibbes & Co., and went into the hands of the United States Treasurer. Afterward it was ascertained by Gibbes & Co. that there had been delivered to them by mistake one hundred and sixty bales of cotton which did not belong to them, and which they accordingly returned. In the bill rendered by Savary & Co. there was charged the sum of $7,733.04 as expended by them on this lot of one hundred and sixty bales. This sum Gibbes & Co. claimed should be returned to them by the United States. To this demand Savary & Co. interposed a further bill of expenses, not included in this first bill, which they claimed they had incurred on the Gibbes & Co. cottons. Their second bill amounted to $4,756.92. Gibbes & Co. alleged that the charges made by Savary & Co. were generally excessive, but consented to receive at that time from the United States the difference between their bill of $7,733 04 and the bill of Savary & Co., $4,576 92, namely, $3,156 12. Afterward Savary & Co. applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment of their bill of $4,576 92. Upon a close examination of all their accounts it was found that their charges which had been paid to them in connection with Government cottons and cottons seized, but released by the Secretary, were excessive to an amount greater than their claim of $4,576 92 against the United States. The payment of this claim was therefore refused.

"The balance (namely, $4,576 92) of the bill of $7,733 04 paid by Gibbes & Co., as expenses on cottons returned to the United States, has never been paid to them. Justice would seem to require the payment of this balance."

In answer to inquiries made by your committee of the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether this claim, if properly presented, would not have been cognizable by the Department without the intervention of Congress, the Secretary, under date of July 13, 1876, replies:

"That prior to the 30th day of March, 1868, the question to whom the sum of money now claimed by Gibbes & Co. was due, whether to them or to Savary & Co., had not been decided. On that day was passed the joint resolution of Congress requiring all moneys derived from captured and abandoned property to be covered into the Treasury. The money in question was included in that fund, and was accordingly covered into the Treasury. Since that time no appropriation has been made by Congress out of which the claim of Gibbes & Co. could properly have been paid.

"Under this state of facts, we think claimants clearly entitled to the relief asked, and therefore report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. BOUTWELL. On that report I do not see how this money should be paid to Gibbes & Co. The report sets forth, as I understand it, that there was held by the Government a sum of $4,000 to be paid to Savary & Co. for services performed upon Gibbes & Co.'s cotton which had been overcharged; that ultimately the Government, instead of paying this sum, refused to pay it, upon the ground that Savary & Co. had overcharged the Government for work done on the cotton, and that as between the Government and Savary & Co. there was nothing due to Savary & Co., and that they held this money to compensate the Government for overcharges.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend from Massachusetts does not understand this matter. Gibbes & Co., who are these claimants, have paid the demand of the Government upon them. This demand of the Government upon them was for money paid Savary & Co. for their care in and about this cotton. When Gibbes & Co. found that there were one hundred and sixty bales of their cotton, of cotton upon which Savary & Co. had made charges, that did not belong to them, they returned it to the officer of the Treasury, and they then claimed that so much of the expenses included in the bill of Savary & Co. as applied to these one hundred and sixty bales should be returned to them. The Government said "You ought to have that money;" and thereupon Savary & Co. said they were entitled to still additional charges, some four thousand, I omit the odd dollars. Gibbes & Co. said, "Our claim upon these one hundred and sixty bales of cotton that have been returned is some $7,000." Savary & Co. claimed $4,000 more. Gibbes & Co. say, "We will take the difference between the seven and the four," and did take, say, $3,000. When they came to make inquiry into the claim of Savary & Co. for the work they had done, the officers of the Treasury found that they had no such claim, and, finding that they had no such claim, they decided that Gibbes & Co. ought to have the balance of this $7,000 which was in the Treasury; but, inasmuch as it had been covered into the Treasury by the act of 1868, they could not pay it, and, therefore, they come to Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That would be so if it were true that the excess charged by Savary & Co. to the Government had been upon cotton that belonged to Gibbes & Co.; but if it were upon cotton generally which had been seized by the Government, the case would be different. The report is not explicit upon that point. It says:

Upon a close examination of all their accounts it was found that their charges which had been paid to them in connection with Government cottons and cottons seized, but released by the Secretary, were excessive to an amount greater than their claim of $4,576.92 against the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to just read from a portion of the report preceding that, and the Senator will see that it is clear of doubt:

In the bill rendered by Savary & Co. there was charged the sum of $7,733.04 as expended by them on this lot of one hundred and sixty bales. This sum Gibbes & Co. claimed should be returned to them by the United States.

It is therefore shown that this $7,000 was expended on the one hundred and sixty bales that were returned.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not think it appears so from this report. If this report be considered as a whole, it does not show clearly whether the extra charges of Savary & Co. against which the Government set up this claim were charges upon cotton that was restored to Gibbes & Co., or were charges upon other quantities of cotton seized by the Government, put into their hands, and on which expenses were incurred and afterward released. It may be so; and, if so, they are entitled to this return.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend will find that this report also states this fact:

To this demand Savary & Co. interposed a further bill of expenses, not included in their first bill, which they claimed they had incurred on the Gibbes & Co. cottons. * * * Afterward Savary & Co. applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment of their bill of $4,576.92. Upon a close examination of all their accounts it was found that their charges which had been paid to them in connection with Government cottons and cottons seized, but released by the Secretary, were excessive to an amount greater than their claim of $4,576.92 against the United States.

I think it fairly appears that this $7,000 was excessive upon these one hundred and sixty bales, and when they came to re-investigate their accounts the officers found that they were not entitled to any such sum. The Secretary of the Treasury also says, as the Senator will see, that justice would seem to require that this amount should be returned to these parties. We were governed not a little by the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that it ought to be returned and that he would have returned it but for the act of 1868.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I dare say it is all right, but the report, I am quite satisfied, does not show that the charges are properly set off against this item. But I do not object to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWIN ROGERS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 991, for the relief of Edwin Rogers.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 991) for the relief of Edwin Rogers was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $525, to re-imburse Edwin Rogers for postage-stamps stolen from his possession as postmaster at North Adams, in Massachusetts, on or about the 13th of May, 1876.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a report accompanying the bill. It is for a small sum, and I believe it comes within the rule the Senate have adopted in all such cases. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, on the 15th of July, 1876:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Edwin Rogers, postmaster at North Adams, Massachusetts, for relief, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That on or about the 13th day of May, A. D. 1876, said postmaster was robbed of postage-stamps to the amount of $525; that every effort was made through the police authorities to detect the thief, without avail; that the postmaster immediately notified the Department at Washington of the robbery, and a special agent was detailed to examine the case and report the facts to the Department, which was done, and the amount of stamps there stolen was found to be $525. It was also found that the postmaster had used due care with the property of the Government, and that these stamps thus lost or stolen were so lost or stolen without his fault.

No suspicion rests upon the postmaster or his clerks.

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, I have uniformly opposed legislation of this character. The case before us is one that I the more readily oppose because I understand from the committee there is no question that the petitioner is honest in the declaration which he makes, that there is no reasonable doubt that he was set upon by robbers and that he lost $500 in postage-stamps; and the bill now before the Senate proposes to shift this loss from the shoulders of the postmaster who gave bond faithfully to discharge his duties and faithfully account for all public moneys and post-office stamps that came into his hands. The Government by this legislation is to relieve the postmaster of his obligation and assume the loss. The principle is wrong. It is one that if continued by Congress must necessarily work a change in the administration of the Government when applied to officers intrusted with public funds.

The principle for which I contend has been repeatedly contested and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, not upon any special statute but upon general legal principles and grounds of public policy, and the doctrine is now well settled that the case of officers who receive public moneys under bond to collect and pay over, perform, fulfill, &c., differs from ordinary bailees, first, because the forcible taking of money from an officer, whether by robbery or otherwise, is not within the conditions or covenants of his bond, and constitutes no answer to a suit on that instrument, and, second, because public policy forbids that such a defense should be allowed. I cannot otherwise so well state the reasons for this view of the subject as in the language of Mr. Justice McLean in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs. Prescott et al., 3 Howard, 578. He says:

This action was brought in the circuit court for the district of Illinois, on a bond given by Prescott, with the other defendants as his sureties, for his faithful performance of the duties of receiver of public moneys, at Chicago, in the State of Illinois. The defense pleaded was that the sum not paid over by the defendant, Prescott, and for which the action was brought, had been feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away from his possession by some person or persons unknown to him, and without any fault or negligence on his part; and he avers that he used ordinary care and diligence in keeping said money and preventing it from being stolen.

To this plea the plaintiffs filed a general demurrer; and on the argument of the demurrer the opinions of the judges were opposed on the question whether "the felonious taking and carrying away the public moneys in the custody of a receiver of public moneys, without any fault or negligence on his part, discharged him and his sureties and may be set up as a defense to an action on his official bond?" And this point is now before this court, it having been certified to us under the act of Congress.

On the part of the defendant it is contended that the defendant Prescott was a depositary for hire; and that unless his liability was enlarged by the special contract to keep safely, he is only subject to the liabilities imposed by law upon such a depositary; that the special contract does not enlarge his liability.

This is not a case of bailment, and consequently the law of bailment does not apply to it. The liability of the defendant Prescott arises out of his official bond and principles which are founded upon public policy. The conditions of the bond are, that the said Prescott has "truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and shall truly and faithfully continue to execute and discharge, all the duties of said office," "of receiver of public moneys at Chicago," "according to the laws of the United States; and, moreover, has well, truly, and faithfully, and shall well, truly, and faithfully, keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public moneys collected by him, or otherwise at any time placed in his possession and custody, till the same had been or should be ordered by the proper department or officer of the Government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment had been or should be received, had faithfully and promptly made, and would faithfully and promptly make, the same, as directed," &c.

The condition of the bond has been broken, as the defendant, Prescott, failed to pay over the money received by him when required to do so; and the question is whether he shall be exonerated from the condition of his bond on the ground that the money had been stolen from him.

The objection to this defense is that it is not within the condition of the bond; and this would seem to be conclusive. The contract was entered into on his part, and there is no allegation of failure on the part of the Government. How, then, can Prescott be discharged from his bond? He knew the extent of his obligation when he entered into it, and he has realized the fruits of this obligation by the enjoyment of the office. Shall he be discharged from liability contrary to his own express undertaking? There is no principle on which such a defense can be sustained. The obligation to keep safely the public moneys is absolute, without any condition, express or implied; and nothing but the payment of it when required can discharge the bond.

The case of Foster et al., vs. The Essex Bank, 17 Massachusetts Reports, 479, was a mere naked bailment, and of course does not apply in principle to this case. The deposit in that case was for the accommodation of the depositor, and without any advantage to the bank, as the courts say, "which can tend to increase its liability. No control whatever of the chest, or of the gold contained in it, was left with the bank or its officers. It would have been a breach of trust to have opened the chest, or to inspect its contents."

Public policy requires that every depositary of the public money should be held to a strict accountability. Not only that he should exercise the highest degree of vigilance, but that "he should keep safely" the moneys which come to his hands. Any relaxation of this condition would open a door to frauds, which might be practiced with impunity. A depositary would have nothing more to do than to lay his plans and arrange his proofs, so as to establish his loss, without laches on his part. Let such a principle be applied to our postmasters, collectors of customs, receivers of public moneys, and others who receive more or less of the public funds, and what losses might not be anticipated by the public. No such principle has been recognized or admitted as a legal defense. And it is believed the instances are few, if indeed any can be found, where any relief has been given in such cases by the interposition of Congress.

As every depositary receives the office with a full knowledge of its responsibilities, he cannot, in case of loss, complain of hardship. He must stand by his bond and meet the hazards which he voluntarily incurs.

The question certified to us is answered, that the defendant Prescott and his sureties are not discharged from the bond by a felonious stealing of the money, without any fault or negligence on the part of the depositary, and, consequently, that no such defense to the bond can be made.

The principles and policy of this decision have been emphatically reiterated in the late cases of the United States vs. Morgan, 17 Howard, 161; The United States vs Dashiel, 4 Wallace, 182; and the United States vs. Keibler, 9 Wallace, 86.

The case I have quoted is argued by Mr. Justice McLean, and to that argument no answer can be made. It is useless to multiply words; but in order to illustrate the force of his reasoning and suggestions, I will, by permission of the Senate, recite a case which occurred in the State of Mississippi while I had the honor to be governor of that State. A sheriff was in default to the State for a sum amounting to about $4,000. He went to the Legislature, backed by his securities, protesting that his office had been entered and he robbed of the public funds of the State. His story was, that late at night, while at the court-house, where he kept his safe, his safe-door being open and he engaged in counting his funds and preparing his papers for settlement with the auditor of public accounts, suddenly a half-dozen men with drawn pistols rushed upon him, knocked him down, gagged and bound him hand and foot, and he was told that if he made any noise his life would pay the forfeit. The funds were taken; the thieves escaped. After a time, suffering great torture on account of the gag that was in his mouth and the strong manner in which his limbs were bound, he commenced his cries, suppressed as they were by the gag. Relief came to him; he was unbound, contusions were found upon his head. These were the blows that had been given him by the robbers. Witnesses testified as to the condition in which he was found. His story was believed. The Legislature of the State without hesitation passed a bill for his relief.

When considering the bill, I called the sheriff before me and after cross-examining him for some time my suspicions were aroused that the case was one put up by him. The principle itself was wrong and I should have vetoed the bill anyhow upon this ground, but I was the more ready to do so after I discovered what I supposed to be some badges of fraud. I vetoed the bill. It went back to the Legislature, but the sympathy for the sheriff was so great that the Legislature soon passed the bill over my veto, and the sum was passed to his credit. About six months subsequently some detectives in working up a case of a violation of law in the county in which this sheriff resided came upon a clew which led to a discovery that the sheriff in the case I have recited had committed a fraud upon the State.

The charge was made, prosecution was about to be entered, but the sheriff fled. It was unmistakably a case of successful conspiracy. This shows how easy it is, and how great the inducement is for officers who have in their hands large sums of public money, to engage in conspiracies of this kind in order to rob the Government.

The Senate is now about to apply the principle in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court to a postmaster. Let this principle be carried out, Mr. President, and in ten years' time I venture to say that the public officials of this Government will represent half their number in public robbers. Not less, I judge, than one million dollars have been voted out of the public Treasury under this character of legislation within the last five years. I have sat by and witnessed it, and occasionally have entered my protest. I now repeat that protest although satisfied this bill is to pass, and would impress upon the Senate the necessity of reform in our legislation upon subjects of this nature so frequently coming before Congress for relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

CATHERINE THRUSH AND WILLIAM B. STONE.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill No. 732.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 732) for the relief of Catherine Thrush and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported an amendment to the bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That the claim of the legal owner or owners of the schooner Flight, her cargo, freight, and personal effects, alleged to have been sunk by collision with the United States steamer Tallapoosa, October 8, 1873, be referred to the Court of Claims, to hear and determine the same to judgment, with right of appeal as in other cases: Provided, That no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of the passage thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read: "An act referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Flight to the Court of Claims."

WILLIAM H. WARD.

Mr. JOHNSTON. At the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] chairman of the Committee on Patents, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of William H. Ward.

Mr. BOGY. If this requires unanimous consent, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not require unanimous consent. The Chair understood the Senator from Virginia to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire from what committee the bill comes?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONKLING. A Senator near me inquires whether it is the unanimous report of that committee. I should like to know.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have the report here.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it the unanimous report to the committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I believe so. I know nothing to the contrary. There is a report in print and it can be read. It was made by the chairman of the committee, and I make the motion at his request.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not feel at liberty to object to the bill. My impression is that the Senate has always been very guarded about allowing any court to cast the Government in damages or royalties for the use of inventions or apparatus covered by letters patent; and in that view the title of this bill when I came to hear it struck me. I will not interpose, having no knowledge of this subject, to prevent the consideration of the bill. If it be taken up, however, I shall ask that we may hear the report read or the special circumstances stated which except this case from the general rule.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I shall ask that the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to take up the bill for consideration.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. A motion to adjourn is in order, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 18, 1876.

The House met at twelve m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commences at nine minutes past twelve o'clock, and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

TIMBER IN COLORADO.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JAMES F. JOHNSON.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4216) for the relief of the administrators or legal representatives of James F. Johnson, deceased, of Montgomery County, Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. KNOTT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4218) prescribing the method of counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, and determining and declaring the result; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SAMPSON. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read at length; and was referred to the select committee of seven on the mode of counting the electoral vote, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN R. F. BERNARD.

Mr. McFARLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4219) for the relief of Captain R. F. Bernard, of First Regiment Cavalry, formerly second lieutenant of cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. DIBRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4220) to improve the Tennessee River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. DIBRELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4221) to amend the internal-revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN ROBERT W. SILL.

Mr. HAYMOND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4222) for the relief of Captain Robert W. Sill, of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. HELEN B. FOSTER.

Mr. HARTZELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4223) granting a pension to Mrs. Helen B. Foster, widow of Edwin R. Foster, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company G, in the Eightieth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF EDWIN R. FOSTER, DECEASED.

Mr. HARTZELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4224) for the relief of Mrs. Helen B. Foster, widow of Lieutenant Edwin R. Foster, deceased, late first lieutenant of Company G, in the Eightieth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETER W. TAYLOR.

MATTHEW BERRY.

Mr. LUTTRELL (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4235) granting a pension to Matthew Berry, late a captain in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICIAL SHORT-HAND REPORTER FOR A UNITED STATES COURT.

Mr. PAGE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4236) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the District of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF THE SOUTHERN BRANCH OF THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4237) to authorize an examination and survey of the Southern Branch of the Potomac River, in West Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EFFICIENCY IN THE MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. HEREFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4238) to promote efficiency in the marine hospital service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY MEHRING.

Mr. KIDDER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4239) for the relief of Henry Mehring; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOSPITAL STEWARDS IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. KIDDER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4240) to provide for the better compensation and to fix the rank and define the duties and responsibilities of hospital stewards of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories having now been completed, the Chair will receive bills for reference from gentlemen who happened to be absent from the House when their States were called.

HENRY C. PARRY.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4241) for the relief of Henry C. Parry, late an assistant surgeon in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A. BURWELL.

Mr. SINGLETON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4242) for the relief of A. Burwell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LOCUST PLAGUE.

Mr. HATCHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4243) making appropriation for a commission to investigate and report on the best means of destroying or providing a remedy against the plague of locusts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM ADAMS.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the relief of the heirs of William Adams, late a private in Company I, Eleventh Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUITS AGAINST MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, (by request,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4245) in relation to civil suits against members of Congress of the United States in the courts of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for bills on leave having been completed, the Chair will now proceed to call the States and Territories for resolutions.

CLAIMS OF SOUTHERN-MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I submit that there is some business pending under this call coming over from the last session which has not yet been disposed of and which is now in order.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule on this subject, but the Chair is of the opinion that the equity of the case requires that that business shall be disposed of.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It should be resumed, as it belongs to this class of business.

The SPEAKER. The resolution to which the gentleman refers came in by unanimous consent and not under the call.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Still it had to go somewhere to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. There is no direct rule on the subject, but the equity seems to point that it should be considered now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Otherwise there would have been unanimous consent to offer a resolution which could never be considered.

The Clerk then read the resolution offered by Mr. THROCKMORTON on the 27th of January last; which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be respectfully requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement showing the amount due contractors for carrying the United States mails in Southern States at the beginning of the civil war, and which has not been paid in consequence of such contractors being unable to take the oath required by law.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We had better have the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. That information has already been furnished, and was before the Committee on Appropriations at a former session. I do not think we ought to cumber the record with a repetition of the same thing.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. One word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I was advised that the information here asked for was furnished to the Committee on Appropriations. I have had occasion to examine the subject, and I find that that information is not as full as it ought to be.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is any imperfection or deficiency in the information furnished, then it occurs to me that we had better have a resolution to insure the completion of it rather than a repetition of the whole thing. If I remember aright it is a very voluminous package and would require the services of many clerks and for a long time to prepare a copy of it. I think it would be better to impower the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, for instance, to have the information completed.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I have no objection to that suggestion, and will modify the resolution accordingly.

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions are now in order from the State of Maine.

PROTECTION OF VOTERS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That it is the first duty of all organized governments to protect their citizens both at home and abroad, and that as one of the highest privileges of a citizen of a republic is the right to cast his ballot freely, the Government of the United States should guarantee to each qualified voter the full and free exercise of his constitutional right to this great privilege; and that this protection should be especially afforded in those States of this Union where any portion of the legal voters have been prevented by intimidation and violence from freely casting their ballots.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to debate this resolution.

Mr. HALE. I was myself on the floor for that purpose. I supposed the gentleman rose to make a point of order, and I was willing to listen to him.

The SPEAKER. That is a point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to debate, and therefore the resolution goes over.

Mr. HALE. I was on the floor for the purpose of debating the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then under the rule the resolution will lie over for one day.

Mr. HALE. I holding the floor?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS IN MISSISSIPPI AND ALABAMA.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That a committee of six members of this House be appointed to inquire into and report upon the manner in which the election was conducted for members of Congress in November last in the sixth district of the State of Mississippi and in the fourth district of the State of Alabama, and whether in said congressional districts there was any intimidation of candidates or voters during the canvass or on the election day, or any fraud or intimidation in respect to registration or voting, or the returns thereof, in said election, or in any way affecting the result of said election; and that said committee may employ a stenographer and be attended by a deputy sergeant-at-arms, and shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HOOKER. Is that resolution debatable now? Will objection carry it over until to-morrow for consideration?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to debate it?

Mr. FRYE. I have called for the previous question upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the call for the previous question shall not be sustained, then if a member rises to debate it it will go over; but if the previous question shall be sustained, then the resolution must be voted upon now.

Mr. HALE. Is it not the right of the mover of a resolution to endeavor to bring the House to action upon it now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not carefully considered this point. Rule 130 reads:

All resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion.

Under the terms of that rule the Chair inclines to the opinion that the ordering of the previous question would destroy the right to debate under that rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is in the power of the House, if the House shall so wish. If the House shall not second the demand for the previous question, then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] or any other gentleman rising to debate the resolution it would go over. That has been the practice repeatedly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that under this rule an individual member has the right to rise and propose to debate the resolution. If the call for the previous question shall be entertained by the Chair, that would cut off the right which is clearly given by the rule.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It has been the invariable practice, so far as I can recollect, that the gentleman introducing the resolution may demand the previous question upon it for the purpose of having immediate action.

The SPEAKER. Yes, but the rule provides that if the resolution gives rise to debate it must go over.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. But no gentleman can take the floor to debate the resolution while the demand for the previous question is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear members on this question.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will see that the discussion now as to the particular disposition of the pending resolution is not of much practical importance. If the gentleman who introduces the resolution calls for the previous question the yeas and nays cannot be called upon seconding the demand for the previous question. If the majority of the House shall vote down the second, then some one may get up and propose to debate the resolution and it must go over, without there being any call of the yeas and nays.

But if the majority of the House shall second the call for the previous question, they have the same right to cut off debate by ordering the previous question on this resolution as they would have to cut off debate by ordering the previous question on any other proposition. I desire to remind the Chair that the practice of this House has been uniform, at least since we have been in it together; it is one of the most common instances that can come up, and it has always been ruled that the call for the previous question is in order.

Mr. Speaker, your predecessors in that chair have always held that under this second call if a member offering a resolution demands the previous question, it must first be ascertained whether there is a second; and if the previous question should not be seconded, then a member may rise to debate the resolution and it goes over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware that the practice of the House has been as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but, notwithstanding that fact, the Chair is of opinion that the right to introduce resolutions under Rule 130 implies the reciprocal right of objection, which is exercised by a member rising to debate the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will allow me to point out one consideration which I think may affect his judgment. If the construction of the Chair be correct, then it would be absolutely impossible for a resolution offered under this second call on Monday morning to be adopted by the House if a single member should object.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The resolution may be acted on after it is laid over one day.

Mr. HOAR. I mean that it would be impossible to have such a resolution adopted on the day of its introduction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman that this morning a resolution which had been offered in the same manner as this, and had come over, was reached in regular order and was adopted.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair does not understand my proposition. My point is, that unless the House has the power to order the previous question, it is impossible for any resolution introduced under the second call on Monday to be adopted on the day of its introduction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that upon this point the practice of the House has been one way while his opinion is another. He is entirely willing to submit the question to the determination of the House, and will therefore entertain the motion for the previous question. The question is on seconding the demand.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will the Speaker hear me just a moment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOSKINS. Is it not the object of a member in moving the previous question upon a resolution under this call to take it out from the operation of that part of the rule which would carry the resolution over?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question were sustained, it would undoubtedly take the resolution right out from the operation of the rule.

Mr. HOSKINS. Very well. As long as the member offering the resolution holds the floor and demands the previous question, the right to debate the resolution does not arise, unless there is a failure to second the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. But the rule gives another member the right to rise in his place and propose to debate the resolution.

Mr. HOSKINS. But he cannot do so as long as another gentleman is on the floor. If the House refuses to second the demand for the previous question, of course any gentleman may rise to debate the resolution, and it goes over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I believe the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The resolution lies over.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that, by unanimous consent, the gentleman may be permitted to introduce a resolution to examine into these questions as they affect the States of Mississippi and Alabama, (not confining it to a particular locality,) and as to the interference, if any, by the military in the elections in those two States.

Mr. REAGAN. Before action is taken on this subject I desire to call attention to this point——

Mr. FRYE. I rise to debate the resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. Each House, by virtue of the Constitution, has the right to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," but by this resolution, we are proposing to investigate the elections, returns, and qualifications of members of another Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this inquiry is extended to the entire State of Mississippi——

Several members objected to debate.

INVESTIGATION OF LOUISIANA ELECTION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a question of privilege. I observe by the RECORD that on Saturday last a dispatch was read before the House and referred to a committee as a question of privilege. As part of the same subject-matter, I desire to read the following for the information of the House, and then I will state my point:

NEW ORLEANS, December 16, 1876.

HON. J. A. GARFIELD:

The dispatch sent from MORRISON to RANDALL is without the knowledge or consent of the committee, who have never been consulted on the matter.

S. A. HURLBUT.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I observe in the RECORD——

The SPEAKER. In what respect is this a question of privilege?

Mr. GARFIELD. Only as the subject-matter to which it refers has been so ruled. I should not myself say that either was a question of privilege. But I believe the Chair has so ruled. Therefore I simply wish that this dispatch may take the same reference as the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that this is an entirely different case. Mr. MORRISON is chairman of the committee; and his dispatch was addressed to the Speaker, an officer of the House. This is the dispatch of an individual member addressed to another individual member. Still, as the Chair supposes, the gentleman's object is obtained.

Mr. GARFIELD. But I wanted to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the dispatch as read on Saturday and printed in the RECORD does not claim to be a dispatch from the chairman of the committee. It is signed by Mr. MORRISON in his individual capacity alone; and this is a disclaimer——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order in proposing to debate the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I then ask that the telegraphic dispatch be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which this subject has been referred. I ask unanimous consent; and, if unanimous consent be not granted, I shall move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FRANKLIN] was recognized when the gentleman from Ohio rose to what he stated to be a question of privilege. The Chair will in proper time recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury be, and are hereby, directed to make a full inquiry as to what action the Secretary of the Treasury has taken in reference to the engraving and printing of internal-revenue stamps in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, as provided for by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," and more particularly by the following clause of said act:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $466,000, said engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, provided the cost does not exceed the price paid under existing contracts."

And to this end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, to employ a stenographer, and shall have leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know if that leave to report at any time granted to this committee will give to the reports of this committee precedence over the reports of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not so regard; but, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has suggested the exception, if there be no objection the resolution will be so modified as not to interfere with reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

LOUISIANA AFFAIRS.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that as the first dispatch from Mr. MORRISON was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary I move that the dispatch which I have received this morning from Mr. HURLBUT take the same reference.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The dispatch from Mr. MORRISON, chairman of the committee, came officially before this House. It came officially from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman's pardon; it was not signed as from the chairman.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It was sent from Mr. MORRISON to the Speaker of this House, and Mr. MORRISON is the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I object to its reference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and refer the communication to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the dispatch was accordingly so referred.

JUDGE HUGH L. BOND.

Mr. WARREN moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of the House is requisite concerning the official conduct of Hon. Hugh L. Bond, judge of the United States circuit court for the fourth circuit; and especially whether such judge has in his recent action in the case of certain persons, said to have been in custody under an order of the supreme court of the State of South Carolina, transcended the legal jurisdiction vested by the Constitution and laws of the United States in him or in said circuit court, or has improperly exercised his legal jurisdiction, if any such he had in the case; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and may report at any time.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to ask the Chair a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear a parliamentary question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask whether that does not involve an appeal from that circuit court?

The SPEAKER. It is not the province of the Chair to answer, any more than it is for the gentleman to ask, such a question, as it is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 75, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bell, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Egbert, Ellis, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Gause, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Haymond, Henkle, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Humphreys, Hunton, Hurd, Frank Jones, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Lewis, Lord, Mackey, Maish, McFarland, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, Neal, O'Brien, Payne, Piper, Poppleton, Potter, Powell, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Swann, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Warner, Warren, Watterson, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Yeates—138.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Chittenden, Conger, Croome, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Eames, Evans, Five, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Haralson, Benjamin W. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Pratt, Rainey, Rusk, Sampson, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, White, Whiting, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Bliss, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Caswell, Chapin, Cochrane, Collins, Cox, Crapo, Danford, Darrall, De Bolt, Dunnell, Eden, Fuller, Gibson, Goodin, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hays, Hoge, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kimball, King, Lapham, Lawrence, Le Moyne, Levy, Luttrell, Lynch, Lynde, MacDougall, McMahon, Meade, Morrison, New, Odell, Packer, Phelps, John F. Philips, Purman, Rice, Robinson, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Seelye, Smalls, Stephens, Stowell, Thompson, Thomas, Washington Townsend, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Walling, Ward, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, Woodburn, and Young—76.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I desire to state that the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. GOODIN, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to state that my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. DURHAM. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, are paired on all political questions.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

JAMES MADISON WELLS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the President having sent to this House a report of certain gentlemen sent to Louisiana to be present at the canvass of the electoral vote of that State in which the returning board is indorsed and sustained as a board made up of gentlemen of patriotism and integrity, and referring to James Madison Wells, president of the board, as follows: "Two of them, Hon. James Madison Wells, president of the board, and General Thomas C. Anderson, next senior member, are southern-born, and of old and highly respectable families. The father of the former was Hon. Levi Wells, of the parish of Rapides, who in 1812 represented it in the convention called to frame the constitution of the State of Louisiana. The son received a liberal education and was early engaged in the care of the planting and other interests of his father. He was a Union man from the time the war broke out, and although he suffered greatly by it in the loss of property, he never faltered in his devotion to the Union cause. Under the Banks reconstruction scheme he was chosen lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Hon. Michael Hahn, who was elected governor, and upon the election of the latter to the Senate, a year after, Mr. Wells became governor of the State, to which office he was almost unanimously re-elected under the reconstruction plan of President Johnson. His experience in public life has been great and varied, and his capacity to discharge the duties assumed cannot be questioned." Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House, at the earliest possible day, from the War Department records, copies of General Sheridan's orders dated New Orleans, June 3, 1867, removing J. Madison Wells from the office of governor of Louisiana; also General Sheridan's letter of June 7, 1867, directed to J. Madison Wells; also General Sheridan's letter of June 3, 1867, to Secretary of War Stanton explaining the reasons why he removed Governor Wells; also copies of all reports, orders, letters, telegrams, indorsements, and memoranda in the War Department connected with the removal of J. Madison Wells from the governorship of Louisiana by General Sheridan in 1867.

Mr. BANNING. I suppose there will be no objection to this resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly there is. I object. The House has nothing to do with these historical events.

Mr. BANNING. Well, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

The question being taken on suspending the rules,

The SPEAKER stated that in the judgment of the Chair two-thirds had not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the yeas and nays. But I think if I might be allowed a word of explanation——

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he take a division first, before demanding the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANNING. Very well. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 121, noes 67; two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 79, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durand, Durham, Egbert, Ellis, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Glover, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Haymond, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Humphreys, Hunton, Hurd, Frank Jones, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lane, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Maish, McFarland, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, Neal, O'Brien, Payne, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Savage, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Swann, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Gilbert C. Walker, Walsh, Warner, Warren, Watterson, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Yeates—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Chittenden, Conger, Croome, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Eames, Evans, Five, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Hendee, Henderson, Hoar, Hoskins, Hunter, Hyman, Kasson, Kelley, Leavenworth, Lynch, Magoon, McCrary, McDill, Miller, Monroe, Nash, Norton, Oliver, O'Neill, Page, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Rusk, Sampson, Seelye, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, White, Whiting, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodworth—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Bagby, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bliss, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Caswell, Chapin, Cochrane, Collins, Cox, Crapo, Danford, Darrall, De Bolt, Dunnell, Eden, Gibson, Goode, Goodin, Hays, Hereford, Hoge, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kimball, King, Franklin Landers, Lapham, Lawrence, Le Moyne, Levy, Lynde, Mackey, MacDougall, McMahon, Meade, Morrison, New, Odell, Packer, Phelps, John F. Philips, Purman, Rice, Robinson, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Smalls, Stephens, Thomas, Thompson, Washington Townsend, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Walling, Ward, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Wigginton, Willard, William B. Williams, Wilshire, Woodburn, and Young—77.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MACKEY said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PACKER, on political questions. If he were present I should vote "ay," and he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which at two o'clock on the third Monday of each month has the exclusive control of the floor to make reports.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am authorized by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask unanimous consent that, instead of proceeding to-day, the committee may on Saturday, the 6th of January, at two o'clock have the same privilege as belongs to it to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the House should not be in session on that day?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. The gentleman from Missouri must take his chance of that.

Mr. BUCKNER. I anticipate no difficulty on that ground.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CLAIMS FOR WAR LOSSES.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the rules be suspended and that the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas fears have been and still are entertained by the people of the United States that Congress may at some time in the future pass laws by which the Government of the United States may be compelled to pay a large amount for damages that were incurred during the late war by persons residing within the States that were then in rebellion against the United States; Therefore, in order to allay such fears and prevent the payment of such claims,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to this House within twenty days, and permission is hereby given for that purpose, an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in substance as follows, to wit:

ARTICLE XVI.

No claim shall ever hereafter be allowed or paid by the United States, in the shape of damages or otherwise, for any kind of property, real or personal, used, consumed, injured, or destroyed by United States troops, or by or through any officers, civil or military, acting under or by authority of the United States, or from any other cause whatever, during the suppression of the late rebellion in any of the States that were in rebellion against the Government of the United States; or, for any property used, consumed, injured, or destroyed during such rebellion outside of said States that were in rebellion, and which belonged to persons residing within such States that were in rebellion, unless the persons owning the property so used, consumed, injured, or destroyed were during all the time of such rebellion loyal to the Government of the United States and gave neither aid nor encouragement to the enemy.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated in reference to this resolution that there was no objection to it. I wish to say further——[Cries of "Regular order!" "No debate!"] I ask the gentleman to so modify the resolution as to make it simply a reference to the committee and not a positive instruction.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No, not the change of a word; you must vote on it as it is.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire it to extend to all the States.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want it more sweeping than it now is. [Cries of "No debate!"] I should prefer the amendment in such a shape as to prohibit the payment of all such claims in future by special act of Congress.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER]——[Cries of "Object to debate!"]

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order on a motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 152, nays 63, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banning, Bell, Blair, Bland, Bradley, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Wigginton, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Young—74.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 683) for the relief of the officers and privates of the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives on the subject of the presidential election be referred to a select committee of seven Senators, with power to prepare and report, without unnecessary delay, such a measure, either of a legislative or other character, as may in their judgment be best calculated to accomplish the lawful count of the electoral vote, and best disposition of all questions connected therewith, and a due declaration of the result, and that said committee have power to confer and act with the committee of the House of Representatives named in said message and to report by bill or otherwise.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House concur in the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4121) to provide for expenses of certain special committees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced as the managers of the conference on the part of the House, Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. ATKINS, and Mr. HALE.

DISTRIBUTION OF UNITED STATES TROOPS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to furnish this House with the number of men enlisted under the act of August 15, 1876, to aid in suppressing the Indian rebellion, to what regiments said recruits were assigned, what amount of appropriation therefore has been expended, the necessity, if any, of retaining said troops longer in the service; also, the present distribution and location of all troops in the United States Army.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 145, noes 12.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

EL PASO, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communications from a special agent of the Treasury and the collector of customs at El Paso, Texas, in reference to a change of that port of entry to Tucson, Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill to allow the Osages in the Indian Territory to expend $50,000 of their fund in the Treasury to supply present urgent necessities; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting inspection reports of the money accounts of that Department, made in accordance with the law of 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting corrected estimates made by Professor Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution, and recommending their substitution for those already printed in Executive Document No. 5; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. YOUNG was granted leave of absence for twenty days on account of important business.

Mr. EGBERT was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of the sudden death of his brother-in-law.

Mr. WALDRON was granted leave of absence for two weeks from Thursday next.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, was granted leave of absence for ten days from Friday next on account of important business.

Mr. PLATT was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. LORD was granted leave of absence for twelve days on account of important business.

Mr. HARRISON was granted leave of absence for ten days from the 22d instant.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to yield to me——

Many MEMBERS. Regular order; regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer a resolution in relation to the election in Mississippi.

Renewed cries of "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for——

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the gentleman has no right to yield. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 130, noes 30; and accordingly (at three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: The petition of Captain A. Housinger, of Philadelphia, for compensation for damages done to the steamer Brazil by reason of a collision with the United States gunboat Lexington, caused by the neglect of the officers of said gunboat, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. BUCKNER: The petition of Pat. O. Hawes for pay and allowances as additional Representative from Nebraska, to the Committee of Accounts.

By Mr. HALE: Memorial of the Board of Trade of Denver, Colorado, that Denver be made a port of entry, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of William E. Hawthorne, late a private in Company K, Thirteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina: Resolutions of the General Assembly of North Carolina, instructing the Representatives in Congress from that State to use their influence to so alter the revenue laws relating to whisky, brandy, and tobacco as to make said laws less oppressive on the citizens, and if this cannot be accomplished to vote for the repeal of the same, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the General Assembly of North Carolina, requesting the Representatives in Congress from said State to use their influence to so modify or repeal the revenue laws of the United States as to give to the producer the right to distill, for his own use, his fruit; also, to repeal or modify the tax on leaf tobacco, to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of certain employés of the House, relating to payments to them for services in the folding-room of the House, to the Committee of Accounts.

By Mr. WALDRON: Papers relating to the petition of Harriet S. Baker, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SPEAKER KERR.

Mr. MORTON. Yesterday resolutions of the House of Representatives were transmitted to the Senate communicating intelligence of the death of Mr. Kerr, the late Speaker of the House. I had a conversation with my colleague, [Mr. McDONALD,] who is now absent from the Senate in the discharge of official duty, and it would be entirely agreeable to his feelings and mine to have the resolutions lie upon the table until my colleague returns to the Senate, and then a day will be fixed upon for considering the matter in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolutions will lie upon the table until the Senators from Indiana desire to have them called up.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 4207) to remove the political disabilities of F. E. Shepperd, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that it may receive the consideration of the committee before we take any action on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with section 208 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of the names of consular officers, not citizens of the United States, to whom salaries have been paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of John R. F. Tattnall, of Georgia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of the Methodist church of Allston, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of F. G. Schwatka, of Oregon, praying compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by him by the use and occupancy by the United States authorities of certain lands in Oregon, known as donation lands, upon which he had settled; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year ending June 30, 1878, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. If there be no objection, I will ask that it be put upon its passage now. The bill has been printed and the committee report it back without any amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no. I object. I am in favor of the bill, but I object to its present consideration.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to move that the bill (S. No. 1040) to allow the late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia his salary, hitherto withheld, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1090) for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1091) to establish a post-road; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1092) for the relief of Jerome Kunkel; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1093) granting a pension to C. H. Frederick; which was read twice by its title, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THOMAS DAY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas Day, of Indiana, $640.75, in full payment and satisfaction for the use of nursery grounds at Madison, Indiana, by the United States, in the year 1863, for a military post and for barracks and hospital purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a report, I presume, in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, July 28, 1876:

The Committeee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day, submit the following report:

The report of the House committee is as follows:

"That this claim was before the Forty-third Congress, and a favorable report thereon made by Mr. JAMES WILSON, of the War Claims Committee of that Congress, now a member of this committee.

"This claim is for the use and occupation of nursery-grounds by the United States, situated in Jefferson County, Indiana. Said grounds were occupied and used during the war of the late rebellion as a military post for barracks and hospital purposes. Your committee believe, from the evidence, that the claimant is entitled to the sum of $640.75 as a compensation for the said use and occupation. They report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage."

This committee only add that the testimony abundantly supports the findings, and also shows that the Quartermaster's Department declined to pass upon the claim, as it was for damages, a subject over which it had no jurisdiction, and remitted the same to Congress. The grounds were taken possession of in January, 1863, and at a time or season of the year when it was impossible to move the trees.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Iowa if there was not an adverse report made by a Senate committee on that claim some years ago?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there was.

Mr. WRIGHT. The record was examined very thoroughly, and my impression is that there was no adverse report by any committee, either of this body or of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you account for this long delay?

Mr. WRIGHT. There was a favorable report in the Forty-third Congress from the committee of the House. The case has been pending for about six or eight years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the impression that some claim like that has once been reported adversely here.

Mr. WRIGHT. I feel very certain that my friend is mistaken. I know that the record was examined very thoroughly by our clerk and also by the members of the committee, and no such claim has ever been passed upon adversely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the name?

Mr. WRIGHT. Thomas Day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rather think that had better lie over until to-morrow, and we can look at it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill is already before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was it reported to-day?

Mr. WRIGHT. O, no; it was reported at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we cannot help it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4124) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. JOHN D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, and Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine managers at the conference on its part.

REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL WARE.

Mr. BOGY. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 97) directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a certificate of relocation for six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Missouri to legal representatives of Samuel Ware.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that Samuel Ware was the owner of land claim No. 438, located in the county of New Madrid, in the then Territory of Missouri, for six hundred and sixty arpents, which was confirmed by act of Congress of the 29th of April, 1816; that the lands having been injured by earthquakes, he availed himself of the provisions of the act of the 17th of February, 1815, whereby persons owning lands in the county of New Madrid which were materially injured by earthquakes were authorized to locate the like quantity of lands on any of the then Territory the sale of which was authorized by law; that, in pursuance of this law, Ware relinquished his claim to the land confirmed as No. 438, under the act of the 29th of April, 1816, and applied for a certificate of relocation; and that on the 16th of August, 1816, Frederick Bates, recorder of land titles, did issue to Samuel Ware certificate of location No. 63, which was afterward located on the east half of section 12, township 24 north, of range 17 east, and the west half of section 7, township 24 north, of range 18 east, on Wolf Island, in the Mississippi River, upon the supposition that the island was in the State of Missouri; and that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (11 Wallace, 395) that the island belonged to the State of Kentucky: Therefore,

The bill requires the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a certificate of new location to the legal representatives of Samuel Ware, authorizing them to locate the certificate on six hundred and forty acres of any land in what was Missouri Territory, subject to sale.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. BOGY. It was reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims. The Senator from Vermont is a member of that committee. There is no objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a House report, the Chair understands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it.

Mr. BOGY. There is no report, because the preamble so fully explains the whole object. I can explain the case in a minute. There was a location of a claim on an island called Wolf Island, in the Mississippi River, and which for many years was believed to be in the State of Missouri. After a time the question was tested as to the fact whether the island was in the State of Missouri or in the State of Kentucky, and it was decided by the Supreme Court that the island was in Kentucky and therefore the location was void. Now his representatives desire to locate the same quantity of land in the State of Missouri. I presume the Senator is familiar with the facts. The matter was considered very fully before our committee, of which I believe he is a leading member, and we agreed to make a unanimous report on this bill at the last session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That leads me to have some question about this claim. If a committee of which I am a leading member unanimously agreed to report this private claim, I begin to think there must be something wrong about it. [Laughter.] But what I wish to ask, as I remember the matter generally, but it is a little out of my mind, is whether it appeared clearly before the committee that this claimant had actually failed to obtain the land, whether in Missouri or Kentucky, which his location called for?

Mr. BOGY. I remember the point was raised before the committee and the information was conveyed to the committee—I am not prepared fully to go into the details—that Ware actually lost his land on the island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; if that be so, of course he ought to have it somewhere else.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

N. H. VAN ZANDT.

Mr. WITHERS. I move the present consideration of House bill No. 2736.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2736) to remove the political disabilities of N. H. Van Zandt, of Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out the words "act of July 2, 1862, and the" before "fourteenth;" so as to make it read:

That all the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon N. H. Van Zandt, a citizen of the State of Virginia, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

WILLIAM S. MORRIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 405) for the relief of William S. Morris, William S. Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company, all of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland; and John R. Graham, late of Philadelphia, now of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Claims, on the 2d of August, 1876:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of William S. Morris and others, respectfully report:

The parties named in the bill were all engaged in the business of carrying passengers and baggage in the city of Philadelphia.

The collector of internal revenue for the district in which these parties did business assessed and collected from them taxes aggregating the amounts respectively named in the bill, under the alleged authority of section 104, act of June 30, 1864, which provides as follows:

"That any person, firm, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business shall be subject to and pay a duty of 3 per cent. on the gross amount of all the receipts of such express business."

It appears that in a large number of cities the officers of the revenue did not construe this law as applicable to persons engaged in business similar to that of the parties named in this bill; that the carrying of passengers and baggage on no continuous or fixed route was not "an express business within the intent of the statute;" but that in some cities now, notably New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago, taxes for such business were assessed and collected.

It appears that, in consequence of this want of uniformity, on April 16, 1870, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue instructed S. B. Dutcher, supervisor, New York, that "it is only those who do their business on regular routes that should be regarded as engaged in an express business and liable under section 104. * * * If taxes under section 104 have been assessed contrary to the above rule * * * you will see that collection is suspended and claims for abatement prepared."

Subsequently, as a consequence of this ruling of the Revenue Department, various parties who had paid such taxes made claims to have them refunded. Among these, Dodd's Express Company, of New York, filed claims July 14, 1870; Parmlee's Local Express Company, of Chicago, August 28, 1871; Westcott's Express Company, of New York, September 22, 1874, and the parties named in the bill under consideration, at various times during the years 1871 and 1873. All of these claims were rejected by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and, as a consequence, Parmlee's and Dodd's Express Companies brought suit in the United States courts, and, obtaining judgments in their favor, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reopened all their claims that he had previously rejected, and refunded the taxes they had paid.

It appears from the evidence on file that the parties named in this bill did not bring suit to recover the taxes paid by them, for the reason that they were given to understand, by the officers of the Internal Revenue Bureau, that the Department would govern itself by such decision as might be given by the courts in the Dodd case, and after that decision, if in claimant's favor, would re-open their cases and decide them in accordance therewith.

On application, however, to Hon. D. D. Pratt, who succeeded to the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that these cases be re-opened and reconsidered in view of the decision of the courts and the fact that other similar claimants had been refunded the taxes paid by them, he declined to re-open them on the ground that "these claims were all rejected by my predecessors in office, and under the rules governing this office I have no authority to re-open them." It appears, however, that after refusing to re-open the cases of these parties he did re-open the case of Westcott's Express Company, of New York, whose claim was originally filed at about the same time as that of these claimants, and refunded to them $21,559 37. In a letter to your committee, April 5, 1876, he states, "I understand that the claims are of the same nature as the claim of the Westcott Express Company;" though he adds, as a reason for his difference of action in the cases, that "the only difference in their status at the time of my entrance upon the duties of this office being that the former stood rejected while the latter was a pending claim."

It appears, therefore, to the committee that claims filed at the same time as those of the parties named in this bill, and of precisely the same nature, have been paid, and that the only obstacle to the claimants in this case having their cases reconsidered under the same rulings that have been applied to all other similar cases is a purely technical one, caused by a change in the incumbency of the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And it further appears that the claimants have no other method of relief except by an act of Congress that will authorize the Commissioner to review the cases, as their long pendency in the Revenue Department, through no fault of the claimants, has caused the time to elapse within which they could bring their cases before the courts.

The committee, therefore, are of the opinion that the bill should pass. In this opinion we are sustained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who states "that as the bill does not direct the refunding of the amount claimed, but simply directs the Commissioner to re-open and reconsider the claims, I can see no objection to its becoming a law." He further says, "I would suggest an amendment at line 5 in the bill, so that it may read 'taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected.'"

The committee recommend that line 5 of the bill be amended so as to read "of taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected," and report that the bill thus amended ought to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to the bill in line 5, after the word "taxes," to insert the words "alleged to have been;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be directed to re-open and reconsider the following claims for the refunding of taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to strike out all from and including the word "or" in the twenty-second line to the end of the bill. The words I propose to strike out are "or that shall appear to be unjustly or illegally assessed or collected," so that it shall be simply "to refund and pay back all of said taxes erroneously assessed and collected," and not for those which shall appear to be so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WRIGHT. May I be allowed to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether the last amendment was an amendment from the committee or an amendment suggested by himself?

Mr. WALLACE. An amendment suggested by myself.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should be very glad to have the amendment reported again. I was engaged at the moment.

Mr. WALLACE. The last clause of the bill is, "or that shall appear to be unjustly or illegally assessed or collected." I moved to strike out all after and including the word "or," so that the Commissioner will only be authorized to refund the taxes erroneously assessed and collected and not those which shall appear to be unjustly or illegally assessed or collected. It certainly will not hurt the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of somebody who knows whether there has been any judicial decision that covers cases of this character, going to show that this money was illegally exacted?

Mr. WALLACE. The report of the committee refers to a case which went to the Court of Claims standing on precisely the same footing in which the Court of Claims ruled that——

Mr. EDMUNDS. What volume is that?

Mr. WALLACE. I am unable to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the name of the case?

Mr. WALLACE. The Dodd case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did it go to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. I know nothing of that. It was decided by the Court of Claims. The report, as the Senator will see, is based on a letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that; but it is Congress and not the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that is to decide whether money shall be paid out of the Treasury after this great lapse of time, and therefore I shall be glad to be convinced myself, instead of taking it ex cathedra from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The appearance of this case, briefly stated, is this: During the time of war taxes were imposed upon the express business, and there were in the city of Philadelphia and in New York and in almost every other city of any considerable size what were called baggage expresses. The officers of the Treasury compelled the owners of them to pay certain money upon their business as a tax upon the express business. Now it is stated that the Court of Claims has decided that that class of business did not fall within the statute under which these taxes were levied and paid; and that having been decided, after a period of ten years or more, Congress is called upon to re-open the subject and to refund those taxes that may appear to have been erroneously or illegally collected.

In my opinion this is a subject that we ought to enter upon with the greatest possible reluctance and only in a case of the clearest illegality. The tax laws of the United States, like all other tax laws, are complicated, difficult of application, whether they are customs duties or excise or internal revenue or whatever they may be. One Secretary of the Treasury, one collector of internal revenue will with entire intelligence and perfect uprightness hold that the law covers a certain class of business and that the taxes are to be paid upon it, while his successor will hold exactly the reverse, and his successor will go around to the first opinion and so on, because the laws are so vague, as in complicated cases they always have been in all countries, that it is difficult for all men to see them exactly alike. But practically it almost always happens in the case of such laws that substantial justice is done and nobody in the community bears more than his fair proportion of the burdens of government. Now, to turn around upon nice discriminations, after the thing is all over, after the baggage-express people have got enough on their baggage to pay their taxes and make money besides, and upon some fine-spun doubt or distinction touching the meaning of the law to re-open the laws collecting taxes and the business of collecting taxes ten years ago, is, in my opinion, a very unsatisfactory piece of business. If you are to follow out the logic of that, there would scarcely be a single subject of taxation during the war or before the war or since that would not fairly fall within the province of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under a bill of this kind if you would only enlarge it according to its own principles, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the other tax-officers of the United States to re-examine all the taxes that have been levied in various ways and strike a fresh balance and see whether too much had not been obtained. Of course, everybody would cry no to that at once; and yet we are asked in this way, if you take it up piece-meal, two or three cases at a time, to go back and split hairs over the statute, which substantially, as anybody can see, whatever a court may have decided, meant to cover this, which was an express business in fact just as much as Adams Express or anybody else's. Substantial justice has been done, and substantially a just contribution has been made to the Treasury. Now we propose to invite the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to take the opinion of the Court of Claims as his guide, not the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States; but to take an opinion in one case as his guide and try to apply that to the people named in this bill, and if he can figure out a result against the Government, to pay them the money. For one I am opposed to it.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask my colleague if he thinks that there could be any proper discrimination as to the kind of property carried in the express business which should exempt baggage rather than merchandise? I suppose the law levied a tax upon express business. Now is it possible that you can exempt baggage any more than you could other merchandise?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The act of Congress on this subject is:

That on and after the 1st day of April, 1863, any person or persons, firms, companies, or corporations, carrying on or doing an express business, shall, in lieu of the tax and stamp duties imposed by existing laws, be subject to and pay a duty of 2 per cent. on the gross amount of all the receipts of such express business.

I take it it would be perfectly clear that under the previous stamp act every parcel they carried would have had to pay a stamp tax; but that was found to be inconvenient, and it was turned into a tax in gross upon gross receipts of 2 per cent.; and now, after the statute of limitations has long since run against them and the thing has gone by for a dozen years, it is proposed to invite the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to see whether he cannot, in the light of Dodd's case, figure out a result for the repayment of these taxes that were honestly and justly levied, and from which, as I should certainly say, with great respect to the court, very likely it will turn out that Dodd's case is entirely distinguishable. I do not know, but I should say, and I think everybody who hears this report read would say, this is just as plainly and in substance an express business as anything can be. It is the carriage of a particular class of parcels for hire, insuring them on their way from one place to another; and I am unable to see how it makes a difference whether you carry them from one railway to another in a city or from a railway to a house or hotel in the city, or whether you carry them as Adams Express does, a part of the way by rail and a part of the way by wagon to your house or hotel in a city. I do not see how it is possible to put such a construction on the law.

But here you propose first to open the statute of limitations in favor of these claimants. In all other cases, customs duties of every kind and internal taxes, the statute of limitations imposes a strict bar, and men stand upon their rights; and, if they think they have paid any taxes that they ought not to pay, they commence their suit in the proper court in season, when the testimony respecting the particular circumstances of the case and the application of the law is at hand. Now it is proposed, in the case of this particular class of business in the United States during the war, to say, first, that the statute of limitations shall not apply, and, second, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall reconstrue the law and be himself the judge, and, if he can find that the United States have improperly construed that statute, then he shall give back the money.

Mr. President, I hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. WALLACE. I can only answer the argument of the Senator from Vermont against this bill by saying that here is a statute, which statute has been construed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue himself as excluding this case and this class of cases. Now, it is not a question of construction to-day; it is a question of what the officers of the Government construed the law to be long since. They construed it to be exclusive of this class of business, and in pursuance of that construction Dodd's Express Company and others made their claim. They were refused payment by the Department, and then they proceeded in the courts, and they obtained a decree in favor of their claim. Thus we have the construction of the statutes by the decision of the courts; and now, having made the rule in these three modes, we came to this case that awaited the action of the Government itself; and, awaiting the action of the Government, the statute of limitations seems to have closed on the case. Because the parties did not sue, waiting the action of the Government, therefore they ought not to have their claim! A rule of law has been made by the Government, not during the war, but under a statute passed in 1864, construed in 1870, which rule has been carried into effect as regards all the rest of the companies; and now, although the others have been paid, although it was just to pay them, it is not just to pay these people who have waited! That is the argument of the Senator from Vermont in effect. It does seem to me that the statute of the Government, and the construction of the statute by the Commissioner himself, and the decision of the courts upon this law and this ruling have settled, not what the law is to be now, but what the law was when it was made, and that rule of law is to settle and conclude all cases of the same character. As these claimants are within this provision of the statute of 1864 as settled by the courts, why are they not within its justice and equity? Is there any good reason why this claim should not be paid? Simply the statute of limitations. The Senator rises in his place and interposes the statute. The Westcott Express Company have got their claim; Dodd's Express Company have got their claim in pursuance of the statute, in pursuance of the construction, in pursuance of the decree of the courts; but time has elapsed, and therefore these parties are not to be paid! Mr. President, I hope they will be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to look at the Dodd case. It all depends on that. It may be that on reading that case we shall see the reasonableness of the decision. Let the bill lie over informally for the present.

Mr. BAYARD. I have sent for the decision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid over temporarily, if there be no objection, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

PHILIP PENDLETON.

Mr. DAVIS. While the Senate is waiting for some information about the bill under consideration, I ask leave to call up House bill 735.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to re-open and re-adjust the accounts of Philip Pendleton, late a paymaster in the United States Army, and allow him such additional credits in the settlement of his accounts as, under the circumstances or in the opinion of the accounting officers, may be just and equitable, for errors and losses of money received by him as such paymaster, if any, growing out of shorts in package of money received by him, which shall be established before them by satisfactory evidence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 3d of July, 1876:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

The Committee on War Claims in the House of Representatives, on April 21, 1876, made the following report:

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton, report:

"That a bill for the relief of Major Pendleton was reported favorably by the House Committee on Claims in the Forty-second Congress, and the bill was reported by Mr. Blair, chairman of the committee, and passed the House. (See Journal, third session Forty-second Congress, page 371.)

"The bill went to the Senate, was not reached in that Congress, and the papers were returned to the House files. In the last Congress the claim was again presented, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but no action was had, as the papers were withdrawn by petitioner, on leave of the House, April 17, 1874.

"The report cannot be found on the files of the House, or with the papers.

"It appears from the evidence that Major Pendleton was appointed a paymaster in the United States Army in the early part of 1861, and served as such until the month of August, 1864. That, during that time, he disbursed very large sums of money in payment of troops in West Virginia, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, and Colorado. Much of the duty performed was done under the most trying circumstances. He was in many instances (scarcely ever otherwise, according to the evidence before this committee) ordered to start at once on expeditions to pay troops without being given time to count the funds turned over to him. He was compelled to take the packages of money for the sums marked on them and receipt for such sums, as thus marked, without any opportunity of opening the packages and counting the money to verify their correctness before so receipting. In some instances the packages fell considerably short of the amount they were supposed to contain. Owing to the excitement of the times, and the continual and rapid changes from one place to another, Major Pendleton had no opportunity offered him to have these errors corrected. By the statement of Comptroller Brodhead, as well as that of the claimant and others, it was notorious that many errors occurred in the Treasury Department in putting up and marking packages of money; that such errors were inevitable and unavoidable by reason of the hurry of putting up the packages and the enormous business transacted at the time. Major Pendleton reported these errors to the Paymaster-General at various times, claiming that he had accounted for every dollar he had received, and that he was, by reason of the amounts receipted for by him, apparently behind in his accounts, when in fact he had not received all the moneys so receipted for. After the close of the war, Major Pendleton tried to have his accounts settled; the war excitement was then over, and the Department was not disposed to allow credits without the strictest compliance with law. Although he had reported deficits, he was held to his receipts hurriedly given. By the accounts, Major Pendleton appeared to be indebted $14,374 50. The petitioner alleges and urges that there are errors in the account and settlement with the Secretary of the Treasury greatly to his injury, and prays for leave to have his accounts referred and re-adjusted by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

"Your committee, therefore, after a careful consideration of the case—the confusion of the times, the haste and emergencies under which the Secretary was forced to transact the business of his Department, and the risks and difficulties encountered by disbursing officers in keeping their accounts, while in the field and on active duty, in a business-like manner—are of the opinion that Major Pendleton ought to be allowed the privilege of a resettlement of his accounts before the Secretary of the Treasury, and respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended."

Your committee addressed a letter of inquiry to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, and, through him, received an answer from the Second Comptroller, in which he says:

"In answer to the inquiries of Senator COCKRELL, I have to state that, should the bill become a law, the action of this office would depend upon the evidence furnished. If upon examination of Major Pendleton's accounts under this act there should be found a balance due him, payment could not be made unless the bill is amended so as to carry with it an appropriation for the same."

As this bill makes no appropriation of money, and only authorizes a re-opening and re-adjustment of his accounts, your committee recommend the passage of the House bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire a little what the bill means. It says that this gentleman is to be paid such losses as shall be just and equitable in his accounts, and afterward it says growing out of shortages in packages. Now, if the bill means growing out of the fact that he is charged with more money than he actually received, that is one thing, and there would seem to be considerable force in it if it were not so long ago; but if it means that they are to take his accounts and allow for shortages in packages after he received them, then it appears to me that it would not be an extremely good bill to pass at any time. The language, it seems to me, is remarkable vague and somewhat mixed. If the point is merely to allow him as a credit such money as he can prove is charged to him that he never received, then, I respectfully submit, the bill ought to say so in very careful language; but if it is to allow the accounting officers of the Treasury to make a general guess over the whole period of his operations and allow him what was short in packages, which may have been in his possession for weeks before they were opened, and would still be an apparent "short" on his side in the packages, I do not think it would be right; and I doubt whether my friend from Missouri who reported the bill would think it to be right. I submit to him that the bill is rather extraordinary or rather loose in that respect.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill makes no appropriation. It simply authorizes the Treasury Department and the officers of that Department to re-open and re-examine this matter; and if they find on re-examination and re-adjustment that anything is due, they have no authority to pay it, but are to report the facts to Congress and then the whole matter will come up before Congress. It was simply to give them the power to re-open and re-adjust this matter that this bill was reported.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not familiar with all the particulars connected with this case, though Major Pendleton is a citizen of the State which I in part represent. The Senator from Missouri examined the case and reported the bill, which appears to have been carefully examined in the House, and the only object, as I understand, is that Major Pendleton may have his accounts re-adjusted. He thinks, as I understand, that the Government is indebted to him some portion of the $14,000 which he and his sureties had to pay, and the object of the bill is to have a re-adjustment of his accounts. I think it just.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope this bill will be disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will only take a moment to act on this, and I hope it will be continued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to make this bill clear according to what is stated in the report, that it is merely meant to cover, as it clearly ought only to cover, if you are to have paymasters responsible to all, overcharges of money to him that in fact never reached him, because the ostensible amounts in the packages were greater than the amounts really were when he got them, I move to amend by striking out the words "equitable" and "errors and losses of," and to insert the words "true" and "charged as," and striking out the word "or" in the eighth line; so that it will read:

And allow him such additional credits in the settlement of his accounts as, under the circumstances, in the opinion of said accounting officers, may be just and true, for money charged as received by him as such paymaster, and not in fact received.

And then to strike out "growing out of shorts in package of money received by him."

In that way you leave to the accounting officers but one single question, and that is the single question that the report of the committee of the House covers, that the paymaster claims and thinks he can show that the packages sent to him purporting to contain certain sums of money contained on sundry occasions less, so that he ought not to be charged with more money than he actually received. That is the uttermost extent to which I should be willing to go.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the bill be read as it would be if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to re-open and re-adjust the accounts of Philip Pendleton, late a paymaster in the United States Army, and allow him such additional credits in the settlement of his accounts as, under the circumstances in the opinion of said accounting officers, may be just and true for money charged as received by him as such paymaster, and not in fact received, if any, which shall be established before them by satisfactory evidence.

Mr. DAVIS. I make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which I had the honor to offer yesterday in relation to a recess. I am desirous that the question shall be decided now. I do not care to press the question particularly myself, but I think it had better be settled now, so that we can make our arrangements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution relative to the Oregon electoral vote.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania if the subject he wishes to call up does not give rise to debate. If it does I should prefer to ask the Senate to take action——

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to know if the Oregon resolution is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am willing to give way to this provided it does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania on condition that the subject does not give rise to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yielding cannot be conditional.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I must hold the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Rather than have any debate I will withdraw at once. As I stated before, my only motive is to have the question decided now. We have been in the habit for long years of adjourning about this time to go home to our families, and it has been understood everywhere that we would do so this year; but if there is any unwillingness to go now, very well. I can see no reason why we should not do now what we have done in former years; but I will make no contest about it. I only offered the resolution that the Senate might have the question before them and decide whether they will adjourn or not. I only ask for a vote on it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask that the pending business be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily. The Chair hears no objection.

STATUES OF WINTHROP AND ADAMS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to the statues that have been contributed by the State of Massachusetts to the old Hall of the House of Representatives. I ask, first, that the letter of the commissioners of the State to the delegation in Congress may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
State House, Boston, July 10, 1876.

To the Hon. Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts in the National Congress:

The undersigned, under the provisions of chapter 64 of the resolves passed by the General Court in the year 1872, were appointed a commission to procure from Massachusetts artists two statues in marble or bronze, to be erected in the Capitol at Washington, as the contribution of this Commonwealth to the National Statuary Hall, in response to the invitation by Congress in the act approved July 2, 1864.

The commission was directed to procure, in the manner before provided, a statue of Samuel Adams, and a statue of either John Winthrop, John Carver, William Bradford, William Brewster, Miles Standish, or Edward Winslow, as might seem to them expedient, as fitting representatives of the colonial and revolutionary periods.

Under the direction of the resolve the commission contracted with Anne Whitney for a statue of Samuel Adams, and by virtue of the discretion vested in them they procured from Richard S. Greenough a statue of John Winthrop, first governor of the Massachusetts colony. Both the artists were born in Massachusetts, and both statues are in marble.

Having been received and accepted, the commission has caused the statues to be placed in the Statuary Hall of the Capitol ready for presentation to the nation.

The commission congratulate themselves that they are able to present the contribution of Massachusetts in the centennial year of the events with which the fame of Adams is so inseparably connected and which were the natural and glorious fruitage of the labors, sacrifice, and doctrines of Winthrop and his contemporaries of the Plymouth and the Massachusetts colonies.

Having progressed thus far in the discharge of the duty imposed upon us by the Commonwealth, we respectfully request you, its representatives in the national Congress, to call to the attention of that body the response of this State to its gracious invitation in such time and manner and with such formality as usage and propriety may seem to you to require and your good taste and judgment may commend.

And we subscribe ourselves, very respectfully and truly, your obedient servants,

W. B. WASHBURN.
HORACE H. COOLIDGE.
JOHN E. SANFORD.
GEORGE F. RICHARDSON.
ERASTUS P. CARPENTER.
FREDERIC W. LINCOLN.
JOHN B. D. COGSWELL.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Speaking for my colleague as well as for myself, in behalf of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and by the authority of its commissioners, we now present to the Senate and to the country the statue of John Winthrop, the father, founder, and first governor of the Puritan colony of Massachusetts; and the statue of Samuel Adams, the earnest advocate, and most logical exponent and defender of the principles of the American Revolution.

The history of Massachusetts begins with the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth in the year 1620, and gathering as in one view all those who in the long period of two and a half centuries have contributed to the prosperity, asserted the liberties, defended the rights, supported the principles, advanced the honor, or extended the renown of that ancient Commonwealth, John Winthrop and Samuel Adams have been selected as most worthy of place in the illustrious group now assembling in the old Hall of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The first choice was made from the men of the colonial period of our history, and the second from the men of the revolutionary era.

In the selection of a person to represent the colonial period there was a difference of opinion between the descendants of the Pilgrims and the descendants of the Puritans; but when the concession was made to the Massachusetts colony there was no difference as to the person entitled to the high distinction of the first choice, and John Winthrop stands as the representative not only of colonial Puritan Massachusetts, but in his principles, ideas, and purposes in government he stands as the representative of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts as it has been, as it is, and as it ever must continue to be.

The Pilgrims came to Plymouth to secure and enjoy religious freedom; the Puritans came to Salem and Boston to found a Christian commonwealth and to extend a Christian civilization.

The Pilgrims had a higher idea of the rights and dignity of man; the Puritans had a broader view of the power of Christianity in the public affairs and concerns of mankind. The success of the Pilgrims has been full and complete, not only within the little colony which they founded at Plymouth, but for all the English-speaking States of America.

As religious liberty is the basis of the higher and purer forms of Christian civilization, the Puritans were compelled, finally, to accept the leading idea of the Pilgrims as a part of their public policy and essential to their undertaking. Thus the principles of the Pilgrims and the purposes of the Puritans were blended into a public policy of religious and political freedom and equality, destined to be as extensive as the civilization and as enduring as the institutions of this continent.

In 1630 the Puritans in England were a class, but not a sect. They sought a better life, but they did not demand unity of opinion in religious affairs. Generally, they condemned the practices and ceremonies of the Church of England, but many of them accepted its creed and participated in its sacraments.

Winthrop and his associates in their letter of farewell say we "esteem it our honor to call the Church of England, from whence we rise, our dear mother, * * * ever acknowledging that such hope and faith as we have obtained in the common salvation we have received in her bosom."

In 1630 the Puritans were a large minority, if they did not constitute a majority, of the people of England; but they had not then sought power nor agreed upon a public policy. In 1640, ten years after Winthrop's departure, the great contest between the church and the Puritans, the king and the people, became active and the peril imminent.

The people protested against the Catholic and against the English Church. Fifteen thousand of the inhabitants of London and seven hundred clergymen of the established church asked that the powers of the bishops and the character of the ceremonies might be radically changed. These concessions were made in form and to some extent in fact.

Political changes in the nature of revolution followed. Strafford was executed, the court of high commission was broken up, the Star Chamber was abolished, the judicial department was separated from the Crown, taxation by the king was relinquished, all ending in the trial and execution of Charles I.

The reign of English Puritanism was brief; but brief as was its career and sudden as was its fall, it left traces of its influence and the footmarks of its power not only in England but in France, Germany, Switzerland, Spain, and the low countries, in the West Indies and the colonies on the continent of America.

The administration of Cromwell forms the most brilliant epoch in British history. He advanced the power and elevated the name of his country wherever it was known. His qualities as a statesman, soldier, and diplomatist were respected or feared in Western Europe and in the European settlements of America. His policy, compared with that of the past, was liberal and wise. He broke at once from the leading-strings of kingcraft and monopoly and put the government of England upon a more liberal policy, and prepared the people to receive more liberal ideas. But twenty years spent in strife, in civil war, in the discussion of questions of policy, foreign and domestic, had robbed Puritanism in England of its power as the advocate of a better religion.

Cromwell left England greater than he found it, and the England of to-day owes much to his administration; but the influence of the puritanism of the seventeenth century is no longer visible in the politics or civilization of that country. Its moral power was destroyed in the effort to establish its authority by force.

In the little colony of Massachusetts its authority was not questioned seriously, either in the church or the state; and never on this continent did pritanism seek to propagate its opinions or gain power by arms. In one particular the Puritans have been misunderstood.

They accepted the truth that there might be a state without a king or a bishop, but they did not realize the kindred truth that there might be a state without a church and a creed. They did not deny the right of private judgment in religious matters, but in their system of government the state and the church were one, and whatever disturbed the peace of the church, in their view, also endangered the existence of the state. If the otherwise fair fame of the Massachusetts Puritans suffers from the charge of persecution, it is to be said in palliation, if not in justification, of their conduct that it was not their purpose to compel others to conform to their opinions, but to save their state from the dangers to which they thought it exposed.

Of Winthrop even more might be said. In 1642, and in his capacity as governor of the colony, he received with kindness and gave aid and comfort to one La Tour, a Roman Catholic, who arrived at Boston from Rochelle, in France. His conduct was the occasion of severe criticism, but in his defense he says "If there were not other sins which God may have a controversy with us for, I should little fear any harm from this."

But it can with truth be said of the Puritan colony and of its administration that the public-school system established in 1642 is based upon the distinct assertion of the right of private judgment in religious matters. If we consider the public school as the only contribution made by the Puritans, it is in the fact and in the ideas which it embraces, the most important contribution to the human race ever made by any set or body of men. It is at once and always better security than can be otherwise obtained for freedom of opinion in all things, for equality of rights in all the relations of life, for the diffusion of the spirit of justice, and a capacity for right-doing without the intervention of law, and at last for governments of the people, by the people, and for the people.

I cannot doubt that John Winthrop is the most important figure in American colonial history. His fortune in England was ample to supply the wants and to support the house of a country gentleman. He was in the practice and in the enjoyment of the income of an honorable profession. When he identified himself with the colony and accepted the office of governor, the most important step, indeed the saving step, was taken in support of the enterprise. During the winter of 1629–'30 one-fifth of the settlers at Salem and Charlestown died of exposure and disease. The survivors did not number more than three hundred, and these were broken and disheartened, and filled with the gravest apprehensions for the future. Several of the settlements had been abandoned, and the very existence of the colony was in peril. Winthrop brought with him about one thousand persons, chiefly immigrants from Suffolk county, and they were re-enforced in the next twelve months by at least a thousand more.

These accessions were from the educated, competent, self-sustaining classes. In six years, and in their capacity as a colony, they founded and organized the college at Cambridge. In six years more they passed the memorable ordinance establishing a system of universal education which is in itself an effectual refutation of the exaggerated eulogy which Buckle has pronounced upon Adam Smith. In thirteen years after the arrival of Winthrop, upon his suggestion, and largely under his guidance, the colonies of Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven entered into a union for mutual protection, which was the type of the confederation and of the Union of the American States.

Winthrop was governor twelve years of the nineteen years of his life in the colony, and there appear to have been but slight interruptions to his authority in the management of public affairs. His religious character and life, his devotion to the interests of the colony, his wisdom, his spirit of conciliation, his power of statement, and his rare ability in argument gave him the post of leader without a rival. Indeed, Washington is not more exalted above his associates of the revolutionary period than is Winthrop above his associates of the colonial.

The statue of John Winthrop is the contribution of the State of Massachusetts. If the influence of his life and opinions and of the institutions which he aided in founding were limited to that Commonwealth it would be an inadequate recognition of the value of his example. The little colony which Winthrop founded was the germ of a new civilization—a civilization whose chief force lay in ideas. These ideas have subjugated states, advanced across a continent, and are now in actual contact with the older civilization of the Asiatic world. In the opinion that this new civilization is an improved civilization we can assert that other states and even other countries are bound with Massachusetts to recognize the services and to extend the fame of John Winthrop.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, there has been no hesitation in the delay of Massachusetts to respond to the invitation of the nation to furnish for the old Hall of the House of Representatives, "statues of two of her deceased citizens illustrious for their historic renown or distinguished for their civic or military services and most worthy of such a national commemoration."

It was no easy task for her to so execute this national commission as to command the approval of the present, and bear the test of future generations, as she turned for that purpose to the long line of her illustrious citizens who had closed lives full of immortal deeds, and conspicuous in history for the rarest virtues.

It was only after much deliberation that she made her selection of the first colonial governor of Massachusetts Bay, illustrious both as the founder of her civil polity and as the father of a long line of her citizens distinguished in each successive generation for eminence in talent, virtue, and patriotism—and still most potential among her people for all that is good and worthy of renown—and with him one, primus inter pares among those great leaders who, a century and a half after her Puritan governor, guided that colony and her twelve sisters through revolution to free and independent States and to their position as one among the nations of the earth. Massachusetts accordingly presents this day to the nation, to be preserved among those of the illustrious dead of her sister States, in that old hall, itself immortal, the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams, the one first in her colonial, and the other first in her revolutionary history. In the discharge of the agreeable duty thus imposed by her upon her representatives here, it has fallen to my lot to speak of the character of Samuel Adams.

He was born in Boston on the 16th of September, 1722, O. S., in the third generation, in direct line from that John Adams who was the great-grandfather of the illustrious patriot and citizen bearing the same name, the second President of the United States. In 1736 he entered Harvard College, and graduated in regular course in 1740; commenced, but did not pursue, the study of the law, entered a counting-house and adopted mercantile business for his pursuit in life, from which, however, he was early turned by the stirring events destined soon and completely to absorb his whole being and control his whole future. He was twice married; first to Miss Elizabeth Checkly, and afterward to Miss Elizabeth Wells. By the former he had five children, only one of whom survived him. He died in the town of his birth, as he had always lived, in poverty, October 2, 1803, at the age of eighty-one years.

Such is the simple and naked record of his birth, life, and death, carefully and unostentatiously traced, as is the custom of the New England family, in the Bible that comes down from father to son, preserving between the books of the Old and New Testaments the genealogy of the families through which it passes, and whose religious character it feeds and supports.

If from this simple page we turn to the story of his life, it will be found to have been one of the most eventful, influential, and positive of all the lives of the great men who, under Providence, molded and determined the destiny of this nation, out of small beginnings, through feeble instrumentalities, and sometimes by mysterious agencies, but at all times by a wisdom and forecast, by a consecration and sacrifice little short of superhuman.

As his life began, so did his work, earlier than that of any of those who worked with him to the final consummation. As early as 1743, thirty-three years before the Declaration of Independence, and when the surface of absolute British rule on this continent had not as yet been ruffled by the slightest breeze of popular discontent, on the occasion of his master's oration at college, he, then just entering on his majority, disturbed the repose of the colonial governor and his subservient council by maintaining the thesis that "it is lawful to resist the supreme magistrate if the commonwealth cannot be otherwise preserved." Thus early in his own life and earlier in that of the nation he helped to create, for it was before the reign of George III had begun, while Washington and John Adams were mere children, and Jefferson was an infant just born, did Samuel Adams, with a forecast then all his own, prepare the way for coming events whose shadow had not yet appeared. The spirit of the Revolution seemed to have been born in him and to have been cherished as a passion from his infancy. Yet he was the most patient of men and awaited its development in others with the calmness and faith of a prophet.

The fire and zeal of the youth were held in check by the wisdom and prudence of maturity. He took on that day only the first step, the sacred right of revolution. But it was a step taken, taken firmly and intelligently, and thereafter maintained against all comers. From that day he seems to have consecrated himself to this new mission. Scarcely a trace of him remains elsewhere or in any other pursuit. An ineffectual effort at the bar, an unsuccessful mercantile venture, and all the rest of that remarkable life was one harmonious growth and wonderful development of the germ which that day put forth its first sign of life. And how marvelously it took root and grew in that genial soil! Though beset on all sides with discouragement and obstacles, confronted with opposition and loaded with obloquy, in perils often from open foes and among false brethren, yet his heart never failed him in his work, and never for an instant did he give over effort till the final and glorious consummation gladdened his eye and ravished his soul.

Nevertheless, for thirty long years from that day it was mostly a work of preparation, ripening only by slow progress and at an almost imperceptible pace into organization, leading ever, though not always by the open way, to that actual resistance from which there could be no retreat, and whose successful issue he never doubted. These were the most remarkable and eventful years of his life, and of the life of any American save Washington yet born. Indeed every hour of revolutionary research makes it more and more apparent that had there been no Samuel Adams, there had been no Washington. The Father of the Revolution must needs precede the Father of his Country.

In his work he was not always understood and was often misunderstood, but he stopped not to explain and wasted no time or strength in vindication.

Recognized by the unerring instinct of the people, from the moment that progress ceased to be silent and unseen and the gathering forces assumed order and direction, unappointed and without other commission than comes in great emergencies from commanding talent, unfaltering faith, and cloudless vision, he stood at all times at the head of the column pointing the way. He constantly encouraged the wavering, urged on the bold, and dispelled the clouds that darkened the path, till the surcharged elements of revolution broke with the clash of arms on the 19th of April, 1775.

In the early morning of that day, forewarned, he left, in company with John Hancock, his retreat in the town of Lexington as the approaching tread of pursuing soldiers was heard in the distance. But the hour of resistance had come and the curtain seemed for a moment to lift from the future, and its coming glories to open before him. Turning toward the first gray of the morning, as it began to light up the eastern sky and direct their unattended footsteps, he exclaimed to his companion, "What a glorious morning is this."

In that period of his life which preceded the open outbreak of hostilities there can be no doubt, I think, that his most important work was done. On this his fame will in the future rest. As its difficulties and complications, its delicate and doubtful methods, its incessant labor and sleepless vigilance, all dominated by one great idea, and pressed forward with an unflinching courage, shall come to be better known by the student of the causes and instrumentalities of which the Revolution was born, so will its luster constantly increase. No adequate sketch even of that work can be attempted here.

Bancroft has truly said that—

It is impossible to write the history of the American Revolution without the character of Samuel Adams, and it is impossible to write the life of Samuel Adams without giving a history of the Revolution, for he was the father of the Revolution.

A bare outline would extend these remarks beyond justifiable limits and only a few prominent points can be touched upon in years crowded with efforts the most efficient, well directed, and successful in awakening, educating, organizing, and inspiring the spirit of the Revolution.

He had scarcely attained his majority and stirred the blood of his rulers by the "incipient treason," as it was called, which lurked in his last college effort, when, recognizing the press as the most essential and efficient instrumentality in any great work dependent upon the popular will, he induced a few of his political friends to form a club for the special consideration of public affairs. By writing and debate and the establishment of a newspaper he endeavored to disseminate among the people the opinions and discussions of this club. The Public Advertiser, whose first number was published in Boston, January 1, 1748, thus became the organ of the first political association in the colonies for the promulgation of those principles which led in after years to the American Revolution.

Samuel Adams was the leader and master spirit among this bold and efficient band of pioneers. He was henceforward a most able political writer, not only for this paper, but in the columns of every other paper in New England to which he could gain access, and over a great number of different signatures, that he might not appear to the people to be working single-handed, but as one of many able and cogent writers upon subjects every hour pushed home to the public conscience and judgment with increasing force. His political writings during this period would, if it were possible to rescue them from oblivion, fill many volumes and would now be of immense value to the student of political history and to a just estimate of the men and measures of that epoch. But from various causes the larger part of this invaluable treasure has been lost. The great variety of names under which they appeared from time to time, and the necessity of concealment to the personal safety of their author growing more and more an object of anxiety and care as troubles thickened, and the carelessness of subsequent custodians having no conception of their value, have all contributed to the loss of a large part of the writings of the ablest political philosopher and statesman of that critical and important period. But enough of them have survived all the casualties which their author's fame encountered in revolutionary times to justify the high estimate which the future generations of the Republic are sure to put upon them.

It was the wont of the towns in the Massachusetts Province to furnish their representatives to the general court with written instructions, some of which were very elaborate and able. Those for the year 1764 from the town of Boston were from the pen of Mr. Adams, and were remarkable for the boldness with which new ideas were enunciated and the measures suggested for their maintenance. Says Mr. Adams:

We therefore, your constituents, take this opportunity to declare our just expectations of you that you will constantly use your power and influence in maintaining the invaluable rights and privileges of the province of which this town is so great a part, as well those rights which are derived to us by the royal charter as those which, being prior to and independent of it, we hold essentially as free-born subjects of Great Britain.

And the instructions conclude with this, in the light of subsequent events, most important suggestion:

As His Majesty's other North American colonies are embarked with us in this most important bottom, we further desire you to use your endeavors that their weight may be added to that of this province, that, by the united application of all who are aggrieved, all may obtain redress.

This was in 1764, ten years before the first meeting of the colonies in Carpenter's Hall in consultation for the common welfare, and is believed to be the earliest suggestion of the Union through which all our glories have arisen. In the next year he held the general court of the colony up to resolve "that there are certain essential rights of the British constitution of government which are founded in the law of God and nature, and are the common rights of mankind;" and "that the inhabitants of this province are unalienably entitled to these essential rights in common with all men, and that no law of society can, consistent with the law of God and nature, divest them of these rights."

These now fundamental doctrines of our polity were then so new that they "startled the whole provice," and we are told that they were received in England as the "ravings of a parcel of wild enthusiasts."

His pen was constantly active in all the following years, feeding the growing popular excitement and leading the public mind and heart unconsciously for a time, perhaps, but steadily and step by step up to the one great act from which there could be no retreat with life and honor.

In 1768, Mr. Adams prepared the celebrated letter of instructions from Massachusetts to her agent in London, which was published in England as the "true sentiments of America," and also addresses in the name of that colony to the ministry and to the friends of America in the mother-country, and a circular letter to each legislative assembly on this continent. Thus all along, and almost in the same breath, did he exhort and encourage the people at home, enlighten and remonstrate with the Government abroad and appeal to the sister-colonies for union in resistance. As early as this year, eight years before the final declaration, Mr. Adams became convinced that the policy of Great Britain toward the colonies was unalterable and that independence or slavery was the alternative before the Anglo-Saxon race on this continent. He did not hesitate himself nor for a moment doubt the choice of the people, so soon as they should see clearly as he did that the choice must be made. From that hour, more or less openly and positively, but never faltering or retreating, he addressed himself to the removal of all doubts and to the clearing of the mists from all visions. How far in advance of all others he was in this great work those can judge who remember that John Adams and Jefferson for years afterward were laboring for a solution, short of separation, of the questions which had arisen between the mother-country and her colonies, and Washington himself confessed, only two months before the Declaration was adopted, that when he took command of the Army, July 2, 1775, he "abhorred the idea of independence."

When the massacre of unarmed citizens in the streets of Boston by British troops quartered in town by a cowardly governor had aroused the people to a pitch of excitement bordering on madness and had crowded the Old South Church with an assembly of men burning with indignation, Samuel Adams was put at the head of a committee to demand again of the governor, in the name of an outraged people, a removal of the troops, which that morning he had refused to the town authorities. The meeting in solemn silence awaited the result of the mission with intense anxiety. The first report that one regiment might be removed had been met by a response from three thousand voices, making the very roof of that venerable edifice to shake, that every soldier must depart.

Mr. Adams, at the head of a new committee, returned to deliver to the quaking governor this response. The scene in the council chamber where he presented to the governor and the commanders of the regiments the reply of the meeting is the most impressive scene of all the Revolution. The orator stretching forth his hand, like Paul before the trembling Felix, said:

It is the unanimous opinion of the meeting that the reply to the vote of the inhabitants in the morning is by no means satisfactory; nothing less will satisfy them than a total and immediate removal of the troops. If you have power to remove one regiment, you have power to remove both. It is at your peril if you refuse. The meeting is composed of three thousand men. A thousand men are already arrived from the neighborhood, and the whole country is in motion. Night is approaching; an immediate answer is expected. Both regiments or none!

There was no mistaking this determined spirit, and the governor, quailing before it, gave the order for the removal of the troops.

The artist has chosen for reproduction in marble, from among all the eventful scenes in the life of this remarkable man, the moment of the utterance of these words, the reply to which was awaited by Mr. Adams, calmly, with folded arms and with compressed lips and firmly knitted brow. And to all coming generations, while one stone shall remain upon another around that historic Hall, shall this marble thus commemorate the courage and heroism to which British authority first surrendered on this continent.

But in the years that immediately followed the great power of Mr. Adams as a leader of the people was even more manifest than when he appeared, in the morning of that eventful day controlling the tempest of popular passion in Faneuil Hall and the Old South Church, and in the evening confronting and overawing royal authority and insolence. Great depression followed this intense excitement. Reaction had set in and the people had begun to falter. Elliott said that "it might be as well not to dispute in such strong terms the legal right of Parliament." James Otis, jealous of Samuel Adams, placed obstacles in his way, and even John Adams, retiring from the Colonial Legislature as if to private life, ceased to write in the cause, "disgusted with the apparent subsidence of the patriotic spirit." The Legislature itself, abandoning the lead of Adams, followed that of the doubting and hesitating, and he was left in a minority. The loyalists were exultant and the patriots disheartened. Then the resolute soul of this great man lifted him to the height of the occasion, and with pen and voice and personal argument, mid obstacles almost insurmountable, he kindled afresh the fires of the Revolution and inspired with new animation and hope and courage the desponding spirit of patriotism.

The people rallied, the dead-point was passed, and the danger was escaped. A weak man may float with the current, a stout one only can stem it.

From this time forward he labored incessantly for union, as in one common cause, of all who complained of despotic rule; first for a general league of Massachusetts towns, and later, as the cause broadened, in an earnest and formal call for a Continental Congress.

In March, 1774, more than two years before the immortal Declaration, in the spirit of prophecy he wrote to Arthur Lee, in England, that by persistency of the British government in its course "will be brought to pass the entire separation and independence of the colonies."

Hutchinson had, nearly a year before, reported him to Lord Dartmouth as the chief incendiary, "determined to get rid of every governor obstructing their course to independency."

He stands out in the history of the progress of the great struggle, not only as among the very earliest in resistance to British aggression, but the first to see the futility of all attempts at compromise, and to proclaim that the hour for separation had come. He moves in the Colonial Legislature the appointment of delegates to a Continental Congress in Philadelphia. The royal governor in alarm attempts to dissolve the assembly, but the door is locked in his face and the key is in the pocket of Mr. Adams. His leadership was as well understood in England as at home, and it won for him with Hancock the immortal distinction of being exempted by name from an otherwise general offer of pardon upon submission to royal authority. In all the sessions of the Continental Congress he was, as at home in Massachusetts, a leader in counsel and in labor, guiding constantly toward and striving ever to reach that day when formal and irrevocable proclamation of independence could be made.

He bore a most conspicuous part in the final production and adoption of that great instrument, and affixed his name to it as the fruition of years of prayer and struggle.

He returned to Massachusetts as poor as when contributions from unknown sources had furnished the very clothes which he wore in Philadelphia. And yet he had scorned the tempter with the gold and the peerage of England in his hand. Incessant devotion to the public service and entire consecration of every energy to the cause of his country had wrought upon him poverty and need. He found himself without even the shelter of a roof he could call his own. He struggled with his necessities as best he could, but failed in his advanced age to better his fortunes and continued to the end of his life to lack many of its comforts.

But he could not be kept from the service of the people, and entered at once into that of his native State, first as president of its senate and later as its governor for three successive terms, and retiring only under the burden and at the command of advancing age.

Mr. Adams was thoroughly democratic in all his instincts and faith. His trust in the people was implicit and unbounded. His political education and his early training as a statesman were in the New England town-meeting the nearest approach to the ancient democracy of any modern political institution, and largely through it he had seen wrought out the wonders of the Revolution. Therefore that form of government for the future States which was the nearest approach to the democratic ideal won his warmest support. He accordingly, with others of the same school, shrank from the present Constitution and was opposed to its ratification by Massachusetts as too centralizing and as cramping the powers and functions of the States. It was only when that ratification was to be accompanied with proposed amendments, giving further guarantees to the liberties of the people and powers of the States, that he finally saw his way clear to advise its adoption by his native Commonwealth.

The sincerity and weight of that advice contributed much to the ultimate adoption of that instrument not only by Massachusetts but by a sufficient number of her sister-States also to make it ultimately the organic law of the land.

This tendency of his mind led him directly, in the division of the country at the end of Washington's administration into parties upon the different rules of construction of the Constitution and consequent differences in policies of administration, to take the side of Jefferson against his own kinsman and co-laborer, John Adams.

Age alone prevented him from becoming a member of Jefferson's first cabinet. A temporary estrangement between the two Adamses followed this political divergence. It was, however, soon forgotten, and the Ex-President, surviving his elder compatriot many years, never stinted his appreciation and commendation of that undischarged debt this nation owes to him who was leader in all the great works of the Revolution.

Mr. Adams died at the age of eighty-one, in the fullness of his years and with his work and fame complete. As they pass in review at the end of the century which their crowning glory ushered in, how grandly they stand out, foremost in the front rank! His was a great, and will ever remain, a historic character, indissolubly linked with every critical, decisive, or glorious step in the progress of the Revolution, from the feebleness of its inception to the grandeur of its consummation. All his life-work led him through ways hitherto unmarked by the footsteps of the statesman and beset with perils, and he walked under a burden of responsibilities few if any others ever bore. On a single misstep hung the life of the nation; yet, in that wisdom and forecast, that boldness and strength, that power at his will alike to inspire and restrain, to stir the popular heart and to hold it in check—essentials all to the success of the great work on hand—he had no equal among the chiefs of the Revolution.

Massachusetts has been slow in doing honor to her illustrious son. But if she comes late to a public manifestation of her gratitude and appreciation she has chosen well the manner and the occasion. At her command, one of her own artists, a lady of rising fame and great promise, has with marked success reproduced, in imperishable marble, the stately form and commanding features of the great popular leader.

One hundred years in the history of the Republic he contributed so much to create have been numbered, and now his native Commonwealth is proud to bear witness at once to his love for her and to his greater love for the nation of which she was forever to be a part. To-day, in acknowledgment of a debt that can never be discharged and full of pride in the name and fame of Samuel Adams, Massachusetts presents his statue to the United States, to be kept in perpetual trust as a memorial of her gratitude and a pledge of her fidelity to the cause of self-government, to which his whole life was consecrated.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk to be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) 1. That the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams are accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress are given to the State of Massachusetts for these memorials of two of her eminent citizens whose names are indissolubly associated with the foundation of the Republic.

2. That a copy of these resolutions, engrossed upon parchment and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. INGALLS. There have been citizens of Massachusetts more illustrious for their historic renown, or from distinguished civic and military services, than those whom she has chosen as worthy of this national commemoration.

The stranger who pauses before the memorial marbles in future years may forget that Sumner and Wilson had so lately departed from this Chamber that they could not become competitors for admission to that silent society of fame; but he will remember that our predecessors had heard the majestic periods of Webster, and the gorgeous rhetoric of Choate and Everett; that upon the floor he treads had fallen "the old man eloquent" at the close of a memorable career. The effigies of the revolutionary heroes around him will recall the memory of Hancock, the first signer of the Declaration of Independence, and of Warren, who died at Bunker Hill; while against the dark and stormy background of the desolate colonial epoch will appear in dim procession the names of Bradford, Winslow, and Miles Standish, and he will ask why the old Commonwealth turned away from these conspicuous sons, and selected for this perpetual, enduring, and eternal honor, as the representatives of her birth and growth; the exponents of her purposes and her convictions; the apostles of her mission and the prophets of her destiny, these less illustrious citizens—John Winthrop and Samuel Adams.

The race to which we belong is characterized by resistless energy. Descending the slopes of the great central Asiatic plateau in prehistoric times, it has moved westward through Europe by some mysterious impulse, subverting empires, displacing populations, substituting languages, imposing new policies and institutions, and giving rise to an organic series of nations which have succeeded each other like the annual harvests of the earth. It was not till the seventeenth century that this great column in its prodigious migration reached the shores of America, and found here for the first time in its eventful march an unlimited field for unrestricted growth and development. To an unoccupied continent, whose river-valleys and mountain ranges compel national unity, it brought the ideas which it has preserved amid all vicissitudes; ideas whose vigor had successfully resisted the modifications of climate, soil, and physical conditions; which had defied repression, and when restrained by power too great to be overcome had preferred deserts and inhospitable solitudes rather than enervating submission to tyranny. Refusing to adulterate its blood with inferior races, it had not degenerated nor lost its intellectual methods and traditions. It loved to make laws and then to render obedience to them. It preferred charters to the sword. It was profoundly religious and expressed its faith in solemnities and creeds.

Since the Christian era there have been no great political movements that have not had their impulse in religious sentiment. The idea of a Messiah has preserved the national existence of the Jews during two thousand years of persecution, and of dispersion to the uttermost parts of the earth. The dogmas of Mohammed changed the destiny of three continents. The protest of Luther against Romanism gave direction to the whole current of modern history. The Reformation gave the Commonwealth to England and the Puritan to America.

Foremost among these pioneers was John Winthrop, a voluntary exile, seeking unrestricted liberty of conscience. The little community that gathered around him necessarily assumed political relations. The idea of personal freedom and independence permeated the fabric and became its controlling impulse. As new colonies crossed the sea, the necessities of defense compelled an association upon the same principle, and when at last the exactions of England grew again to be intolerable, Samuel Adams became one of the apostles of the political gospel that all men were created equal.

In the interval that has followed the final removal of exterior obstacles the ideas of Winthrop and Adams have advanced with inexorable vigor, subduing a continent for their habitation, and molding with despotic sovereignty the institutions and laws of forty millions of men. It has been said that the Puritans came to America to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, and to compel everybody else to do the same. Whether this be true or not, it is certain that the political system based upon the ideas of Winthrop and Adams has been inflexibly aggressive and intolerant. During the early years of the Republic it regarded with increasing discontent the advance of human slavery. Its opponents were not warned in time. Democracies are generous but they are jealous. They endure much but when they are wronged they sometimes take more than their due. When dissatisfaction assumes the form of resentment, one volume of a nation's history is closed and another is opened.

The irrepressible conflict was proclaimed and the contest waged with increasing intensity. Political complications deferred the crisis till the issue was precipitated upon the plains of Kansas, and John Brown of Osawatomie there raised anew the standard of universal freedom under which he marched to Harper's Ferry, and which the nation seized at the gallows of Charlestown and bore in triumph to Appomattox Court House. Whatever may be said of the policy or expedience of these great movements, history will not fail to record that those who inherited the political principles of Winthrop and Adams were inexorably logical and courageous, and that they shrank from none of the consequences of their convictions. They were not only determined to be free themselves, but that all who were accessible to their influence should be free also whether they wanted to be or not. They promptly relinquished the rights of conquerors, and admitted the vanquished to the full exercise of unrestricted citizenship. Following their doctrines to their logical conclusions they made citizenship national; they enfranchised the illiterate millions who had been relieved from bondage and intrusted them with the ample prerogatives of freedom. It was a terrible experiment. Self-government was never subjected to such a stress before. Whether it will survive the shock remains to be determined. The portentous emergency that confronts us to-day is one of its inevitable results, and it will require the active co-operation of all the higher forces of society to prevent destructive organic changes.

The tendency of the democratic idea in America has not been destructive as in other countries. It has not striven to tear down, but to construct and build up; to repair and not to waste. It has always exhibited an impulse toward the coalition of all its elements. Whether in the feeble days of the colonies or the succeeding era of our growth and glory, this instinct has always been visible and it has developed into a purpose whose conservative and beneficent influence cannot be overestimated, not only in the present but in all future crises that may threaten the nation. This purpose is national unity, the determination that the United States shall be a great continental Republic, powerful and indissoluble, offering a refuge and asylum to all who love liberty, and sovereign among the nations of the world. To realize this sublime conception incredible sacrifices have been made. Personal rights for a long period were cheerfully surrendered. Armies and navies have been organized for military and naval operations commensurable in magnitude with the great fields upon which they were conducted. Hundreds of thousands of lives have been sacrificed and hundreds of millions of treasure expended to establish the national integrity. It is not too much to say that this purpose is so deeply imbedded in the convictions of the American people that it can never be abandoned. It has cost too much to be peacefully surrendered. We are now in a transition period. We have acquired a habit of subordination, and may confidently anticipate the acknowledged supremacy of law.

In view of these considerations, this interruption of the proceedings of the Senate in the presence of questions of momentous interest ceases to be inopportune or formal. It is an admonition of profound significance. Massachusetts turns from her warriors, her statesmen, her orators, and acknowledges her supreme allegiance to those potential ideas which for two hundred and fifty years have defined the path of her progress. She announces that against the temptations of policy or place or expediency she shall recognize morals as an element in politics and the golden rule as a maxim of government; that in the future as in the past she will insist upon national integrity, equality before the law, universal education, the elevation of the masses, the protection of labor, the promotion of the material interests of the country, and the continued activity of those great moral forces which underlie true national grandeur.

I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2606) for the relief of Catherine Harris;

A bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4246) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Bay City, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 4248) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser, late corporal of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Patrick Noonan, Company G, Fifth United States Infantry;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) authorizing the issue of clothing to Company A, Second Regiment United States Cavalry;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Francis Hegner, Company F, Seventh Cavalry, and Private John C. Collins, Company G, Seventh Cavalry; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergeant Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 4,000 copies of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics for 1875, with the accompanying engravings, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The regular order is called for, being the resolution directing an inquiry as to the eligibility of J. W. Watts as an elector for the State of Oregon and the circumstances attending the appointment of electors in that State.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this resolution has been under discussion from time to time for something over one week. I have made no particular effort to bring it to a vote, but I trust the Senate, if the discussion is through or if it can be finished within any reasonable hour to-day, will remain until a vote is taken. I consented that the matter might go over yesterday from the fact that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] desired to speak, and I was very anxious to have him speak. He is still laboring under physical disability and is unable to be here. So far as I am concerned, I intend to take but very little time in addition to that already taken. There are a few things, however, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate in reference to this matter before the vote is taken, and I allude particularly to the statement made by Governor Grover in justification of his action in regard to the certificates that were issued to presidential electors in Oregon.

It is not often that a judicial officer or a person acting legitimately in a judicial capacity feels constrained, after he has rendered his decision and delivered his opinion, to come out in a card in the public papers and give reasons in justification of his course. It is perhaps, however, not so strange that when a ministerial officer, clothed solely and purely with ministerial powers transcends his plain and explicit commission and assumes judicial functions, exercises judicial functions, passes upon rights, adjudicates upon questions, he should feel called upon to come out in a card over his own signature and give reasons for the action taken by him. That seems to be the case in this particular instance. I hold in my hand what purports to be, and which I have no doubt is, a card over the signature of Governor Grover, of Oregon. It is published in the New York Herald of the 8th of December, and it is to some extraordinary statements in that card that I desire, before a vote is taken on this resolution, to call the attention of the Senate very briefly. Governor Grover in that card uses this language in part justification of his course:

That instrument—

Referring to the Constitution of the United States—

declares that no person holding an office under the United States shall be an elector. J. W. Watts, one of the electors voted for in Oregon, was on the 7th day of November holding an office of trust and profit under the United States, to wit, postmaster at La Fayette, Yam Hill County, and he so held that office for more than three years.

Now I call special attention to what follows:

Many more than the number of voters constituting his majority had actually passed in and out of his office on official business. His official character was generally known and was mentioned during the political discussions of the canvass.

There is the broad statement of the governor to the effect that many more than the number of voters constituting Watts's majority had actually passed in and out of his office on official business. Now, then, to the facts. Let us see whether that is precisely so. How are we to arrive at a correct conclusion in regard to that matter? First, by ascertaining what the majority of Mr. Watts was in the State of Oregon over Mr. Cronin. Mr. Cronin received 14,157 votes, all told; Mr. Watts received 15,206, all told. Watts's majority, therefore, in the State was 1,049. Now take the county of Yam Hill, in which the post-office is located, of which Mr. Watts was postmaster, and ascertain what the whole vote is in that entire county, not merely in the precinct in which this post-office is located, but in the whole county, and we find that in the county of Yam Hill Mr. Cronin received 674 and Mr. Watts received 810 votes, all told. So that it is necessary, under Governor Grover's statement—that is, to make his statement conform to the truth—that not only every republican voter among the patrons of this office, but that every republican voter in the county of Yam Hill should have gone in and out of this post-office on official business, and still after that had been done Watts would have a majority of nearly 300. But how many more post-offices are there in Yam Hill County? How much of a post-office was this office at La Fayette, in which so much official business was transacted, according to the statement of Governor Grover? In addition to this post-office at La Fayette, there are eleven other post-offices in the county of Yam Hill. There are twelve post-offices, all told, in that county; and, that the Senate may understand still more fully the insignificance of the business transacted in that office and the facts in reference to the extraordinary statement of the governor that more than Watts's majority in the State had gone in and out of that office on official business, I beg to read a dispatch I have just received from Hon. H. W. Scott, of Oregon, a member of the national republican committee for that State, in answer to one I sent him yesterday for information on this subject. The dispatch is as follows, addressed to myself:

PORTLAND, OREGON, December 18, 1876.

Total vote La Fayette precinct—

That is the precinct this office is in—

Hayes, 106; Tilden, 83. Precinct includes considerable scope of territory outside of town, and nearer other post-offices. There is a post-office at Saint Joseph, in La Fayette precinct, at which a number get their mail. Others in La Fayette precinct are nearer Dayton, and get their mail there. It is not probable that more than one hundred voters of both political parties regularly get their mail at La Fayette.

This statement of the governor is so wild of the truth, so unjustifiable, as it seems to me, that I have felt called upon to submit these facts for the consideration of the Senate.

But that is not all in reference to this card of Governor Grover. He states further it will be observed, that "his" [Watts's] "official character was generally known." Does Governor Grover presume to say to the Senate or to the people of the United States, to whom perhaps this card is addressed, that the republicans of the State of Oregon are all such consummate asses, such benighted fools, that they would proceed with the canvass to an election with a person known to them to be ineligible as a candidate for elector for the office of President and Vice-President? Is that the kind of a compliment the governor of our State desires to pay to persons constituting the party to which he does not belong in that State? But he says further:

His official character was generally known and was mentioned during political discussions of the canvass.

Well, that is possible, but I scarcely think it probable. I traversed that State from one end to the other, from north to south and east to west during the campaign for six weeks before the election and up until the day of the election; I was there in the State in my own precinct on the day of the election; I voted; and I remained in the State for four days after the election was over; and I state to the Senate that up to that time I never heard the suggestion made from man, woman, or child, in the State of Oregon, that Watts was a postmaster. There was no paper that said anything about it. There was no man, so far as I know, who ever called attention to the fact. But still Governor Grover says:

His official character was generally known and was mentioned during political discussions of the canvass.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator whether the republican party of Oregon had a State central committee with power to supervise the canvass and take notice of any mistake of that kind and correct it if discovered?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have a republican State central committee in Oregon with a most vigilant chairman who devoted his time exclusively to the campaign, and as a matter of course if any suggestion of this kind had ever been made in the State by anybody it would have been corrected.

Mr. BOGY. I will ask the Senator a question. Did he not himself know that Watts was postmaster?

Mr. MITCHELL. If my attention had been called to the fact I have no doubt I should then have remembered that I had known it some time before, because I presume the fact is that he was appointed on my recommendation.

Mr. BOGY. Does not my friend think that Mr. Watts knew that he was a postmaster himself?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BOGY. Knowing the fact that he was postmaster, he being an intelligent citizen of Oregon, cannot the Senator suppose that he knew he was not eligible as an elector?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is very doubtful in reference to that; and in saying that I do not undertake to cast any reflection upon the intelligence of Dr. Watts

Mr. BOGY. Can it be, in the Senator's estimation, that he is less intelligent than this large population of whom he has just spoken in Oregon who were so intelligent that they must have known that he was not eligible? They knew the fact that he was postmaster. Were they less intelligent than the men who voted for him?

Mr. MITCHELL. As to just how intelligent Mr. Watts is I would refer my friend from Missouri to the democracy of Oregon who suffered pretty severely under his campaign in the last election.

Mr. BOGY. I am only applying the Senator's own rule of argument; that is all.

Mr. MITCHELL. As a matter of course Watts knew that he was postmaster; but I have very grave doubt, he not being a lawyer, not being in the habit perhaps of consulting the Constitution of the United States as a great many very good men are not in the habit of doing, whether Dr. Watts knew that the fact of his being postmaster made him ineligible as an elector.

Mr. BOGY. What becomes of your vindication of the rest of the people of Oregon? Are they all lawyers, the remainder of those voters, that they must have known that he was not eligible if they knew the fact that he was postmaster?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not been talking about the question of knowledge of the law; I have been talking about a matter of fact; the question as to knowledge of the disqualifying law was argued here the other day, and Governor Grover places his vindication upon that idea, that in order to elect the minority man it is necessary that a sufficient number of voters to overcome the majority of the majority man should have known not only the disqualifying fact but the disqualifying law also. In other words, the doctrine of the law, ignorantia legis excusat neminem, does not apply in a case of this kind, but the fact of the existence of the disqualifying law must be brought home to the actual notice of the party. But I was not talking about that; I was talking about the question of fact. Governor Grover undertakes to defend his action on several grounds. One ingredient entering into that self-vindication is the statement made by him that more than this majority, to wit, more than 1,049 republicans of Oregon, went in and out of this post-office on official duty before Postmaster Watts, and they must as a matter of fact have known of the existence of this disqualifying fact. That is what I was talking about.

Then further, in order to bring his case within the rule of the law, namely, that knowledge of the disqualifying law and of the disqualifying fact must both be brought home by actual notice, the governor says:

The law was known and the fact was known, rendering it disgraceful in him to be an elector.

There is where Governor Grover plants himself in vindication of this extraordinary conduct upon his part. I say, in the absence of my colleague, [Mr. KELLY,] who is away—whether on official duty or not I do not exactly know—that the constitutional inhibition was not known generally, and it is no poor compliment to the intelligence of the people of Oregon when I say it either; and, so far as the fact is concerned, I am absolutely certain it was not known by more than one-tenth, at the very most, of the majority that Watts received over Cronin. I feel perfectly assured of that. Now what does the Governor say further? He says:

A protest was filed in the executive office by prominent citizens objecting to the issuance of a certificate to Watts as a person disqualified, accompanied by proof of his disqualification, and demanding the issue of the same to the eligible person having the next highest number of votes. A reply was filed objecting to anything but a count of the votes and a certificate of the count, and making no denial of the disqualifying facts.

And then the governor resolves himself into a court; he files the pleadings; he perhaps hears witnesses; without the power to swear a witness, he tries a great fact, or at least he establishes a principle, if he does not try a fact, in this case that would in many other cases compel him to try important facts; and then after having heard the case what does he say? He says:

It was ruled in the case—

By the governor, of course—that when the objection to an applicant's right to receive a certificate rests upon the ground that a constitutional provision is interposed, the governor, acting under oath to support the constitution, is bound to entertain and determine the question.

But further:

It was also held that, the law and the fact being well known—

Was the governor justified in making any such statement as that in vindication of his course, that the law and the fact were well known, when, as I have shown from the records, his statement in reference to the facts is very far from being justified by the facts themselves?

It was also held that, the law and the fact being well known, the votes cast for the ineligible candidate cannot be counted for any purpose, and the eligible candidate having the next highest number of votes was duly elected.

And then he says:

This ruling was based upon standard authorities, such as Cushing and Grant, the decisions of many courts like the supreme court and the court of appeals of New York,

When in truth and in fact the court of appeals of New York have decided the very reverse in reference to a parallel case.

The latter is also the uniform practice in the United States House of Representatives.

Here again is a statement that will not be borne out by the facts or by the record of the House of Representatives.

And—

Says he—

it is in accordance with the great weight of all English authorities, both parliamentary and judicial.

What further does he say, and I call attention to it to show that he has misstated, to use a mild term, the law of his own State in making this vindication of himself. He says:

The law of Oregon providing for filling all vacancies in the electoral college, recognizes a vacancy only in cases where there has been an incumbent and such incumbent has died, has refused to act, neglected to stand, or is otherwise absent.

I call attention to the closing words in that sentence, "or is otherwise absent." That is not the law; that is not the reading of the law; and how that can be the construction of the law is more than I am able to say. The statute on that subject reads as follows:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The statute says: "By death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." Governor Grover says: "Refused to act, neglected to stand, or is otherwise absent." The governor interpolates the word "absent" which is not in the statute at all. The statute stops with the word "otherwise." The governor adds the word "absent." An argument was made the other day by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] on the subject of vacancies to the effect that there could be no vacancy where there was a failure to elect. That very often is so in many of the States and the adjudications are different in different States. Pennsylvania has decided one way and California has decided the other; and Missouri and other States have differed. But all these questions must be determined, and are determined—how? By the constitutions and the laws of the respective States; and that is the very reason we find different adjudications upon this question in different States. It is because the constitution and the laws are different on these matters in the different States, and the question as to whether or not there is a vacancy in the office of presidential elector in Oregon must be determined, not by the adjudication of this State or of that State, but by a fair and reasonable construction of the constitution and the laws of the State of Oregon; and I say that any lawyer, who will take the trouble to take up the laws of Oregon on this subject from beginning to end and examine all their provisions, will not hesitate to come to the conclusion that a vacancy occurs in the office of presidential elector when for any cause the whole number are not there on the day fixed for their meeting by the act of Congress.

Our statute in Oregon on the subject of vacancy contemplates—what? It contemplates the right of a competent tribunal to declare void an election that is void for any cause, by reason of ineligibility if you please of the party voted for; and there is no vacancy, at least so far as State offices are concerned, to which the same rule does not apply that is applicable to this matter, because the manner of appointment of presidential electors is left to the State. I say the law of Oregon does provide for declaring a vacancy by the decision of a competent tribunal where the election as a matter of fact is void, as I will show. I call attention to section 45, on page 709 of the Code of Oregon, providing how offices shall become vacant:

Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;
2. His resignation;
3. His removal;
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
5. His conviction of any infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
7. —

And this is what I call special attention to—

7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.

So that the law of Oregon provides in terms that, where a person is voted for for any office by the people of that State who is ineligible, then, upon a declaration to that effect from a competent tribunal, it is a case of a vacancy, not a case of a failure to elect, as was argued by the Senator from Pennsylvania the other day. And will anybody question the right of the Legislature of Oregon to establish its own rules in reference to this matter? It cannot be contended for a moment that this was a case of a failure to elect and that there was no vacancy. Governor Grover himself assumed to be "the competent tribunal" mentioned in the statute which might declare void an election or appointment. He acted upon the assumption that he was the competent tribunal. He declared the election void. If he was "the competent tribunal" and if he did rightfully declare the election void, what result followed? Under the plain provision of the statute of the State, a vacancy occurred, and not a case of a failure to elect simply; and, there being a vacancy, then in any possible view of this matter who had the right to fill it? That is the next question. We all agree on this. There is no dispute here. Governor Grover himself must necessarily concede that if there were a vacancy he had no right to fill it; but that that right belonged to the other electors, as provided in another section of the statute to which I called attention the other day and which I read a moment ago. That statute declares:

The electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.

I do not know whether Judge Hoadly obtained his cue from Governor Grover or Governor Gover obtained his cue from Judge Hoadly. Judge Hoadly says, if I remember rightly, that he prepared his opinion for Governor Gover at the instance of Mr. Pelton, who is I believe the private secretary of Governor Tilden. In that opinion or at least in his communication to the Cincinnati Commercial, giving that paper a statement of the points presented in his opinion, Judge Hoadly uses this language:

As John W. Watts was the postmaster of the county seat of one of the most important counties in Oregon, I presume that the governor and secretary of state, the canvassing board of Oregon, found in point of fact, if they adopted the rule of the case of the People vs. Clute, that this fact was sufficiently notorious to the republican electors of Oregon to charge them, or at least enough of them, with notice of the fact of his ineligibility to bring it within this rule so far as the matter of fact is concerned.

* * * * * * *

Without knowing, therefore, whether the governor of Oregon adopted the Indiana rule or the New York rule, I think I am authorized to presume that if he espoused the New York doctrine he was satisfied in canvassing the votes that a number of republican electors voting for Watts more than equal to Watts's majority over Cronin knew that he was a postmaster, and that the same number either knew or were bound to know of the constitutional disqualification which attached to the office of Watts.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I have to say in reference to this matter. I have felt it to be my duty to call attention to these statements in the card of Governor Grover, and let me once more call the attention of the Senate to the slender authority, to the slender structure upon which Governor Grover could stand legitimately in an exercise of the extraordinary power that he took unto himself. Under the statutes of Oregon it is no part of the duty of the governor of Oregon even to issue a certificate to presidential electors. All he has to do in the matter is to sign his name to certain lists which the statute says shall be prepared by the secretary of state and to which the secretary of state shall attach the great seal of the State. Section 3 of the laws of Oregon providing for the election of presidential electors reads as follows:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter—delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

The secretary—

Remember now they are to be "given, received, returned, and canvassed," not certified, "as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress." In reference to members of Congress, the governor of the State under the law is made to do an additional duty to that devolved upon him in reference to the certification as to presidential electors. Let us turn to that act and see. Section 33, page 706 of the code provides for canvassing and returning the votes for members of Congress; I will read it:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner, if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys, and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for either of such offices, and shall issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

Now in reference to the election of members of Congress the governor does what? He sits by; he is present when the secretary canvasses the vote. When the vote is canvassed, then, so far as relates to members of Congress and State officers, it is the duty of the governor to do what? To issue a certificate to whom? He has no judicial power there, not a particle; but he is to issue his "certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes."

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said the other day, "suppose Queen Victoria had the highest number of votes;" I say he had no discretion in the matter but to issue his certificate to Queen Victoria. He said, "Again suppose Goldsmith Maid had the highest number of votes, what then?" I say then no person would have been voted for; and he would not issue any certificate at all. But what I wanted to say was that this last duty that the governor has to perform with reference to members of Congress, namely, to issue a certificate and make a proclamation, are things that he does not have to do with reference to the presidential electors, because the votes for presidential electors are given, received, returned, and canvassed the same as those for members of Congress; but they are not certified to the same as members of Congress. Why? Because the law in the one place as to members of Congress says that the governor shall issue his certificate and make proclamation, while in the other case in reference to presidential electors the law says this:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors, at the hour of their meeting, on such first Wednesday of December.

So there is the structure and the only structure upon which Governor Grover could stand in reference to any action that he may have taken in reference to presidential electors; and if any lawyer in Christendom, if Judge Hoadly, after a careful examination of all these provisions—and he evidently did not canvass them all—can come to any such conclusion as that the executive of the State of Oregon had the right to exercise judicial functions or quasi-judicial functions and pass upon this important matter, then I confess I have read law in vain and know nothing about it whatever.

I have nothing more to say except this: My friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggested an amendment, and he has appealed to me to accept that amendment. It is an amendment which modifies the preamble of this resolution. I regret to say that so far as I am concerned I cannot accept it, and I hope it will not prevail. One reason why I cannot accept it, one reason why I think it ought not to prevail, is this: I upon my own motion asked that this resolution with its preamble might by a vote of the Senate be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in order that the Senate might have the benefit of the opinion of that committee both as to the form and propriety of the preamble. The resolution went to that committee by a vote of the Senate. It was taken up by that committee, carefully considered, modifications proposed and adopted, and the result is before the Senate. A majority of that committee have recommended the adoption of the resolution and the preamble as it now stands before the Senate. That is one reason. Another reason why I shall oppose the amendment in regard to the preamble is because the preamble is right, because it ought to be there, because the resolution would not be complete without it, and if objection at all exists to the preamble it is to be found in the fact that it is mild, moderate, merciful; and it is not unusual to prefix preambles to resolutions; and it seems to me that it is eminently fit, when a resolution of extraordinary character, as the one before the Senate is, is presented for the consideration of the Senate, that the reason in a mild form at least should be stated as a preamble to the resolution, especially if the resolution seeks to inquire into the conduct of officials. If the public charge that is made is a venial one, let the preamble be mild. If it is a grave one, then I say justice to the person charged, justice to Governor Grover, justice to the Senate, justice to everybody requires that the reasons be given in the preamble for the proposed action. Therefore I hope that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware will be voted down; and begging pardon of the Senate for taking up so much time, I submit the matter, and hope we may get a vote to-day if possible.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in my absence, I believe on Friday last, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] replied to some remarks that I had made on this question, and I propose now to answer them very briefly, not at all complaining that they were made in my absence. My being absent was my fault entirely.

The Senator from Ohio read what purported to be a brief which had been submitted by Judge Hoadly, so called I believe, of Cincinnati, to the governor of Oregon, and upon which it is said the governor of Oregon acted. In law this paper is exceedingly brief, and I think I but do it justice when I say it is the thinnest and poorest pettifogging I ever saw put upon paper. While purporting to discuss the law governing the question of elections, it ignores the great current of American authorities, refers to three American authorities which have no connection whatever with the case, and wholly fails to state the substance of the fourth opinion, which is chiefly relied upon. But the great current of American authorities upon this question is ignored, as also the action of the two Houses of Congress. In this opinion of Judge Hoadly we find the following statement:

Upon this question how votes cast for an ineligible candidate are to be considered, two opinions have obtained in the United States. Unless I am misinformed as to the facts of the Oregon case, Governor Grover's action is not in conflict with either of these views.

Here we have the extraordinary statement that Governor Grover's conduct is not in conflict with either view that has obtained in the United States. The mere reading of that statement ought to be a sufficient answer to all that there is in it. He refers to the case in 15 California to show that where a candidate was ineligible at the time of his election that difficulty cannot be cured afterward so as to make him eligible to take the office; but he utterly ignores the two strong direct California decisions to the effect that the minority man is not elected. That was hardly dealing frankly with Governor Grover. If he himself was not a lawyer and this opinion was sent to instruct him, when the California reports were referred to by Judge Hoadly, he ought to have stated that that court had decided that the minority candidate was not elected where the majority candidate was ineligible. I read the authorities the other day and need not again refer to them. Judge Hoadly refers to the case in 4 Harris and McHenry, the case of Hatcheson vs. Tilden and Bordley. There the majority candidate brought suit for the purpose of recovering possession of the office. The office, I believe, was that of sheriff. He was ineligible because he owned no real estate, which the law of Maryland required a sheriff to own. The ineligibility was removed at twelve o'clock on the day of the election, and he brought suit to recover the office. The only question in that case was whether he was made eligible at that time. As to whether the minority candidate could be elected nothing was said. The minority candidate did not claim the office; there was no question of that kind referred to; and yet Governor Grover is gravely referred by this Cincinnati judge to that case as if it had something to do with the matter. He then refers to the case of the Commonwealth vs. Read, 2 Ashmead's Reports. That was a case of a corporation election. The law required the corporation in electing a treasurer to vote by ballot. Nearly all the members voted orally, viva voce. One man voted by ballot. The court held that the others were no votes at all—which was very correct—because they had not voted by ballot. And that is referred to as an authority bearing upon this question. Now I come to the fourth case, and that is the Indiana case, upon which he places the most stress. He only states a part of that case. I am going to read what he says about it. He makes this quotation:

Where a majority of the ballots at an election are given to a candidate who is not eligible to the office, the ballots so cast are not to be counted for any purpose. They cannot elect the ineligible candidate or defeat the election of the opposing candidate by showing that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. It follows that the eligible candidate will receive an office, although less than a majority of the votes are cast for him.

That is the part he quotes. If he had quoted the whole case, it would have shown that the Indiana case does not cover the Oregon case at all. I call the attention now of the Senator to the fact that this Indiana case, which is so often referred to, does not cover the Oregon case at all, and if Judge Hoadly had quoted the whole case to Governor Grover it would have so appeared.

I may remark that the Indiana case, going as far as it does, has been, I believe, condemned by every court that has passed upon it outside of Indiana. It has been expressly condemned by a committee of this body and by the action of this body. It has been expressly condemned by a committee of the House of Representatives and by the action of that House repeatedly. But coming to that case in its full length and breadth, it does not help Governor Grover one bit. Now, I am going to read that case, and I call the attention of Senators to it. In that case Wallace was a candidate for sheriff in the county of Marion, in which is the city of Indianapolis. He had been elected mayor of the city of Indianapolis. The law expressly gave to the mayor of the city of Indianapolis a criminal jurisdiction throughout the county. He became a candidate for sheriff in the same county and was elected. Under the constitution he was ineligible. What did the court say in that case, and, by the way, a case that has been condemned everywhere? The court said:

Where the ineligibility of a candidate arises from his holding, or having held, a public office, the people within the jurisdiction of such office are held in law to know—are chargeable with notice—of such ineligibility, the votes given for such candidate are of no effect, and his highest eligible competitor is elected.

The court below fell into error on this point by viewing Wallace simply in the character of mayor of Indianapolis. As mayor, he was simply a corporation officer, and perhaps necessarily known as such only within the city limits. But he was more than a city officer; he was a judicial officer, a judge of a court, with jurisdiction co-extensive with the county limits, created to administer the general laws of the State to the extent of his jurisdiction. In this capacity of judge, the people of the county were bound to know him, and were bound to know the disability as to the right to hold other offices which his character as judge brought upon him by the constitution and laws of the State.—14 Indiana Reports, 103, 104.

The point there decided was that inasmuch as his criminal jurisdiction extended to the whole county, the people of that county had constructive notice that he was ineligible. Apply that to the Oregon case. Let us suppose that the people within the mail delivery of the postmaster at La Fayette, Oregon, were bound to take notice that he was a postmaster and ineligible. That would be the furthest that this constructive notice would extend. How far would that go? I saw a dispatch to-day, I believe in the hands of the Senator from Oregon, and will thank him if he will let me have it. Here is a little post-office that is not a presidential appointment, as I am informed; not large enough for that, in the town of La Fayette, in the county of Yam Hill:

Total vote of La Fayette precinct—

That is the whole township—

Total vote of La Fayette precinct, Hayes 106, Tilden 83. The precinct includes considerable scope of country outside of town, and nearer other post-offices. There is a post-office at Saint Joseph in La Fayette precinct—at which a number get their mail. Others in La Fayette precinct are nearer Dayton and get their mail at that point. Not probable that more than 100 voters of both parties regularly get mail at La Fayette.

In the same township—

Now apply the case of Gulick, this Indiana case, to the Oregon case. Let us hold that the people within that post-office delivery were bound to take notice. How many were there? Taking the votes of both parties there would not be, as we are informed, 200 votes in that post-office delivery.

Mr. MITCHELL. The salary is $268.

Mr. MORTON. The salary is $268. Suppose we strike out all the votes in that post-office delivery Watts still has a majority of 800 votes left, men who had no notice, constructively or otherwise, that he was postmaster, so that if Hoadly in presenting the Indiana case to Grover had given him the whole case, it would show that it did not cover what he was required to do. I understand that my friend from Pennsylvania, the Senator on my left, [Mr. WALLACE,] does not advance the idea that Cronin was elected. He was presenting us a sort of color for Grover's action; he was constructing merely a fig-leaf. My friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was also trying to form a fig-leaf to cover the nakedness of the action of Governor Grover. My friend from Pennsylvania in the course of his remarks did not say whether in his opinion Cronin was elected, and I should like to ask him that question now. I will give him the floor if he will answer it.

Mr. WALLACE. As I am put on the witness stand by the Senator, I will state that I said distinctly that my opinion in that case was that there had been a failure to elect in the State of Oregon.

Mr. MORTON. I overlooked that part of the Senator's speech. The Senator believes that Cronin was not elected and that the governor of Oregon had no right to issue a commission to him. The Senator from Tennessee on my right, [Mr. KEY,] I believe, on yesterday stated that in his opinion Cronin was not elected, and I believe I have heard no one yet in the Senate advance the opinion that Cronin was elected. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] cannot say so, because it would be in conflict with the views of the law that he has before strongly expressed in the Senate. But they say there was no election.

This Indiana case therefore may be left entirely out of view. I am referring to this brief of Hoadly's, which seems to have been intended to form an excuse for the action of the governor of Oregon. He himself has brought it forward and has volunteered the statement that he was the man who furnishes the law to the governor of Oregon. I say that this brief of Hoadly's misstates the law and the fact. It suppresses the great current of American authorities, the action of the two Houses of Congress, and represents to him what is not the law in any State in this Union, not even in the State of Indiana. If he had been frank to the governor of Oregon and read to him the whole Indiana case it would have shown that even that furnishes no excuse for his conduct whatever.

The best that has been attempted in the Senate in regard to the action of the governor of Oregon has been to say that he had some color. Nobody has ventured an opinion thus far that Cronin was elected, but the attempt has been to form a sort of excuse for him. So far as this fig-leaf is concerned it is my purpose to even tear that away to show that there was no color, and that the action of the governor of Oregon was directly in the face of the statutes of that State, not to say of the general law of the land.

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not understand his observation. We contend that Cronin was elected and I think every Senator on this side of the Senate will assert so. He did not receive a majority of the votes, but yet he was elected, for being elected the governor certified to his election. That is the proposition.

Mr. MORTON. My friend says all the Senators on that side contend that the action of the governor of Oregon was right, and Cronin was elected, when the Senator from Pennsylvania has said within two minutes that there was no election; that Cronin was not elected. My friend did not hear his friend from Pennsylvania; he did not hear his friend from Tennessee, who said that Cronin was not elected. This is the first time that I have heard it said by any Senator that Cronin was elected. The Senator from Ohio took good care not to say that, and he will not say it to-day. I venture that assertion——

Mr. BOGY. Cronin could not have received the certificate of election, unless he had been elected, unless the man who gave the certificate thought he was elected, surely.

Mr. MORTON. He did receive the certificate of election, not having been elected. That has been often done. That is the very thing we are complaining about, that he was not elected, but was falsely certified to be elected. Now I call the attention of the members of the Senate and of the country to the statutes of Oregon that have just been read by my friend from Oregon. My friend read the thirty-third section of the act, which shows that the votes for secretary of state, treasurer of state, justices of the supreme court, members of Congress, and district attorneys shall be opened and canvassed by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor. The governor is merely a witness; the work is to be done, the counting is to be done by the secretary of state. The governor is simply to be present; that is all; he has no connection with it otherwise; he takes no part in it; but it is to be done in the presence of the governor by the secretary of state. And then the law reads thus:

The governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for either of such offices, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

That takes away all discretion upon the part of the governor. He shall issue a certificate "to the person having the highest number of votes."

It may be that the supreme judge or the secretary is ineligible; it may be that the member of Congress is ineligible; but the statute is positive that the governor shall certify to the man having the highest number of votes. That is all he has got to do. If he does less than that, or if he does more than that, he comes short of his duty. That cuts off all judicial power, it leaves him no discretion whatever. It is positive like the New Jersey statute I had occasion to examine to-day. The governor is simply to certify to the man who has the highest number of votes. That is the positive obligation of the statute of Oregon. I want Senators to notice that when they make their arguments trying to justify the action of that governor.

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

The thing to be done just as it is done for members of Congress. That is all. He has no more power to decide upon questions of eligibility than he has in regard to members of Congress. The canvass is to be made precisely as for members of Congress, and in regard to members of Congress the statute says that he shall certify to the man having the highest number of votes; and that was Watts in this case, so that he violated the statute of Oregon directly and expressly. The section further provides:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

These votes are to be opened and canvassed as for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall make out a list of who is elected and the governor shall certify to it. He has no discretion; it is a simple ministerial duty. The law says that the governor shall certify to the list thus made out by the secretary. If there is any discretion anywhere it is in the secretary, it is not in the governor, because this statute says that he shall certify the list thus made out by the secretary. That is all he has to do about it. He has got no more discretion than a page, not a particle. The statute is obligatory and positive that he shall certify to the list made out by the secretary, and the secretary shall canvass the votes just as for a canvass in case of members of Congress; and in regard to members of Congress the statute is positive and peremptory that the man who has got the highest number shall be certified. Therefore this governor had no more power to pass upon the question of eligibility than he had in regard to members of Congress or in regard to a State officer, and in regard to those he has to certify to the man who has the highest number of votes.

Looking at these statutes, even the fig-leaf is gone. There is no possible excuse for this conduct; there is no color for it; it is a direct and positive violation of the statutes of Oregon, and it is so entirely outside of the question of the decision being wrong. If he had discretion then he decided right against the law, right in the teeth of the law as it has been laid down in the Senate on various occasions, by the House of Representatives, and by every court in the land, I believe, save one, and even that has not gone to the extent of covering this action in Oregon. Now I come to another point:

Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

The list is to be delivered to the college of electors, the phrase "college of electors" being used; and that means more than one elector. It means at least the majority. It speaks of them as an organized body; it speaks of them as the "college;" it does not say that the certificate shall be delivered to each elector to make it an individual concern. O, no; but the law says that the lists shall be delivered to the "college of electors." That means delivered to the electors when they are together and have assembled to perform their functions. How did the governor observe that part of the law? Did he deliver the certificates to the college of electors? No, sir; they were delivered to this man Cronin, who himself had never been elected and who carried them off out of the room. They should have been delivered to the college because the law of Oregon requires it, and when they were delivered to one man, even had he been elected, that was a violation of the law. He had no right to give them to an elector, however honestly elected. They are to be delivered to the college; that is to say, to the electors when assembled to perform their functions. That is the law of Oregon. If Cronin had been lawfully elected, to give to him the certificates and for him to have carried them off would have been as clear a violation of the law as could be imagined. It will require a very ingenious horticulturist or agriculturist to construct a fig-leaf big enough to cover this part of the transaction.

Mr. BOGY. I would say to the Senator that being delivered to the college they had to be delivered to one member of the college.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir, not to one member of the college; the certificates are to be delivered to them when in session, to all of them.

Mr. BOGY. They were not in session.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir, they were not in session; but they were delivered to a man who did not belong to the college and who carried them off. That is the way of it. It was all a part of the arrangement; and this man to whom they were delivered, himself never elected, went off and constituted himself a quorum. It generally takes at least a majority to make a quorum, and this man who was never elected constituted himself a quorum; he went off to another room, and there he appointed two other men and they cast the vote of Oregon. My friend smiles at that. It is too ridiculous and contemptible to be gravely discussed anywhere; and yet that is the trick that is to control the election of a President of the United States. Heaven save the mark! By the way I want to speak of another matter.

While the Senator from Oregon was speaking about this constructive knowledge of the people of Oregon my friend from Missouri, who is exceedingly alive to the importance of this question, asked him whether Watts himself did not know that he was a postmaster. I suppose he did. He wanted to know if the Senator from Oregon himself did not know it. Suppose he did know the fact, yet that that fact made him ineligible even did not occur to the Senator from Oregon, good lawyer that he is. I might turn that a little. My friends turn it away. There is a certain man living in Saint Louis by the name of Frost, a man of a good deal of notoriety, who was in the confederate army, and ineligible under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. BOGY. I deny that.

Mr. MORTON. My friend says he denies it. I suppose it did not occur to my friend that Frost was ineligible. He is a much more public man in Missouri than Mr. Watts is in the little State of Oregon, very much more. He has been an officer of the Army of the United States, has been in the senate of Missouri, was a prominent man, and a man of character; and his public career was well known throughout that State. He was a graduate at West Point, had served in the old Army, went into the confederacy and was disqualified by the fourteenth amendment, and has never been relieved by this body.

Now my friend, according to his authority, according to his rule of logic, was bound to take notice of that; and when he voted for Frost he voted for him knowing that he was ineligible, and so with every democrat in the State of Missouri knowing that Frost was ineligible, whereas I suppose not one in a thousand ever thought about it, just as in the case of Oregon. They might have known that he was in the confederate army and an old officer of the United States, for he is a man remarkably well known; but the fact that that made him ineligible under the law did not occur to my friend from Missouri or his fellow-democrats, intelligent as they are. I might refer to other cases by way of argument. If the action of Grover was right in Oregon and the law that he acted upon is good law, then it must have been good in Missouri, and there the certificate should have been given to Steifel, the highest republican candidate for elector in that district; but, as the farmer said to the lawyer, "circumstances alter cases," and what was good law in Oregon was not good law in Missouri.

I want to call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania and others to the statute of Oregon in regard to filling vacancies:

The electors of President and Vice President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector—

Not "by absence;" O, no—

any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.

If there shall be any vacancy by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, a vacancy from any cause whatever, then the electors present shall immediately fill the office.

This is the broadest statute that I know of in any State; very much broader than that in the State of Missouri, as I can show to my friend. This provides for filling a vacancy for any cause. If they voted for but two men in the first place, and thus left a vacancy, they can fill it under that provision. If they thought they were electing a man, and they failed by mistake of law, by accident, or mistake of fact, and did not elect him, they can fill it. Here is a broad statute authorizing them to fill a vacancy from any cause whatever. There may have been no election at all, and yet they can fill the vacancy. You cannot conceive a vacancy existing from any cause that could not be filled by the electors in Oregon. Therefore, this goes far beyond the statute of Missouri, as I can show to my friend; and he will readily admit it. This comes directly within the act of Congress. I want to call the attention of my friend to the act of Congress. I turn now to the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes:

Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such a manner as the Legislature of such State may direct.

This provides for a case where there was no election at all. We will suppose that the people of Oregon only put two names on their ticket, and did not vote for three electors, only voted for two, and, therefore, there is a vacancy, an original vacancy, if you please. Then under this act the Legislature may provide for supplying that vacancy at a subsequent day. That vacancy may be supplied in any way that the Legislature of Oregon shall provide. This brings the statute of Oregon to the very case referred to. They have provided for filling that vacancy by authorizing the electors to fill a vacancy occasioned in any manner whatever, arising from any cause, because the words "or otherwise" are just as broad as they can be made. They might have written a whole page, but could not make it any broader. It comes directly in the wake of the act of Congress. The act of Congress authorizes the State of Oregon to do just what she has done, and she has authorized the electors to fill a vacancy arising from any cause. There is a complete chain of title. There is not a link of it out.

In the case of the statute of Missouri—I have not got it before me, but I remember it well—that provides for a vacancy occurring by reason of the absence of any of the electors appointed, first requiring them to be appointed. It declares that, if there is a vacancy among the electors that have been appointed, the electors may fill that vacancy, so that it is very much more narrow; and yet it was considered broad enough in Missouri to include the case of filling a vacancy of a man who was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment. I would say to my friend from Missouri, if he is looking for technical objections to an elector, that he should bestow his attention nearer home than the State of Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did the majority of electors fill the vacancy in that case in Missouri?

Mr. MORTON. I think so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to know of the Senator from Missouri if that is a fact, if the majority of the electors in Missouri filled the vacancy, whatever it was?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. And a vacancy of an elector who has first been appointed, mind you; there must have been an election and then a vacancy. He must be dead, absent, resigned, or refused to act, but first under the statute of Missouri to authorize electors to act the electors must have been appointed. That is not the case in Oregon. It goes much beyond that.

Enough, Mr. President, on that point. Now in reply to my friend from Ohio, who somewhat criticised my argument the other day, I want to say that I am willing to let the result of this case abide by his report to this body in the case of Abbott, and upon the very able speeches that were made in support of his report in that case. I will ask the Secretary to read those passages that I have marked on the two hundred and thirty-fifth and two hundred and thirty-sixth pages of the Globe of the session of 1871–'72. I will state that these speeches were made in the Abbott case where a seat was claimed for Mr. Abbott as the minority candidate, because Vance, the majority candidate, was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment and that the votes cast for him were considered as void and thrown away.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Again, in the English cases the intention of the voter to throw away his vote might well enough be imputed to him, because, as I said, it belonged to him, and if he knowingly and willfully voted for a man whom he knew would never be allowed to hold the office, the natural presumption was that he intended to throw away his vote; and it is upon this ground, that he did willfully throw away his vote, that his vote is rejected from the count. This can be proved in a sentence almost. If the English voter voted for a disqualified man, not knowing of the disqualification, even the minority man is not elected. We all agree to that. Every case says that. The bare fact, then, of disqualification or disability on the part of the man receiving a majority does not elect the minority man. It is necessary not only that the majority man shall be disqualified, but that the voters shall have had clear, positive, certain knowledge of this disqualification, and yet contumaciously, willfully, and knowingly cast their votes for him; and when that is the case they may well enough be presumed to have intended the natural result of their act, intended to throw away their votes.

* * * * * * *

I proceed to show further differences between the English cases and the case before us. In the English cases the voter knew to a moral certainty that the person for whom he voted would never be permitted to hold the office. There was nothing in the British constitution, nothing in any act of Parliament, nothing in any judicial or parliamentary decision that held out the least idea or hope that the disqualification of the person voted for would be removed, and he be permitted to take and hold the office.

* * * * * * *

4. Again, in England numerous decisions had settled the law. The Senator from Wisconsin said it had been settled for three hundred years. I do not care about going into the chronology to know whether that settlement was perfectly exact or not, but it was well settled in England that in elections of the kind that have been referred to, if the voter knowingly cast his vote for a disqualified man, that vote would be rejected. Every voter, therefore, casting his vote for a disqualified man, knowing him to be so, knew that the minority man would be seated, and therefore he might be held to have assented to the seating of that minority man. But no such thing was known to the General Assembly of North Carolina. They had no right to think any such thing, for from the very foundation of this Government down to this day, at least from 1793, down to this day, there is an unbroken chain of cases in both Houses of Congress against the idea of seating a minority man, while there is not one single instance from the foundation of the Government to this day in which a minority man has been seated in either branch of Congress on the ground that the man who received a majority of the votes was a disqualified person.

Mr. MORTON. There is the strongest possible statement made by the Senator from Ohio in his speech. He says there is not a single instance in the Congress of the United States where it was ever done. Again he says:

Again, here is another thing that the Legislature of North Carolina had a right to know—and that distinguishes this case from the English cases—and that is, that the weight of judicial decision in the United States is decidedly against the claim of a minority man to an election. That is an element wholly wanting in the English cases. In England the entire current of decisions was that the minority man could have the seat. In America the decided weight of judicial opinion, in fact every case but one—in fact every case but one decided by a supreme court is against the pretensions of the minority candidate; and that the Legislature of North Carolina had a right to look at and to build their expectations upon when they voted for Mr. Vance.

And that is the case in Indiana—

I could not possibly state the law any more strongly than it was stated by the Senator from Ohio. Again he said:

Here, then, are no less than six or seven important, nay almost every one of them conclusive, elements in this case, not one of which was in the English cases; and yet it is contended that the Senate of the United States is to disregard the first principles of republican government, and seat a man who did not receive one-third of the votes of the Legislature upon the doctrine of the English cases, when those cases and the case before us stand on wholly different foundations.

The Senator from Ohio here said that this doctrine of seating the minority man was antirepublican and in violation of the very first principles of republican government. If I were to try, I could not state the law so broadly and strongly as he has done, and yet the Senator from Ohio, with all his learning, did make a mistake in regard to the English law because he gave to it a force and an effect that it never had; and I will call the attention of my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the reference he made the other day. I have here a late English case in which this whole doctrine is discussed at great length and with ability and it is just as much against the claim in this case as are the American cases. I refer to the case of The Queen vs. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Tewkesbury in the law reports of 1867 and 1868. This case was decided in 1868:

Held, that the mere knowledge on the part of the electors who voted for B. that he was mayor and returning officer, did not amount to knowledge that he was disqualified in point of law as a candidate; and therefore their votes were not thrown away, so as to make the election fall on the fifth candidate.

And this whole case, as I will read, goes to show that mere knowledge of the fact that a man holds an office which disqualifies him does not make the votes given for him void. The voters are not presumed to know the law, but it must be shown that they knew the law as well as the fact, and the doctrine that all men are presumed to know the law does not apply to a case of that kind. I will now ask the Secretary to read what I have marked, but before reading the whole case I want to read a little summary from it in the conclusion, though I desire the whole case to go into my remarks because it discusses the whole question of presumptive knowledge of the law. The court say in conclusion:

But it does not seem to me consistent with either justice or common sense, or common law, to say that, because these voters were aware of a certain circumstance, they were necessarily aware of the disqualification arising from that circumstance, and that therefore their votes are to be considered as mere nullities. Upon this ground I do not think the votes given in ignorance that Blizard was in law disqualified are made out to have been wholly thrown away, and that Moore is entitled to act as town councilor.

There the officer who was disqualified presided at the election. His presiding there gave notice of his disqualification. The fact was known to all the electors, because the disqualified officer was there in the performing of the act which disqualified him. That is to say, he could not be a judge in his own election. And yet the court held that the voters were not presumed to know the law that made that fact a disqualification. I will now ask my friend the Secretary to read commencing page 635, from there to the conclusion of the case.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is therefore necessary to decide whether the mere knowledge of the fact that Blizard was the mayor and returning officer must be taken to involve knowledge of his being disqualified for election. Every elector in the borough must have known that Blizard was the mayor, and every elector who saw him presiding at the election must have known as a fact that he was the returning officer, and every elector who was a lawyer, and who had read the case of Reg. vs. Owens, would know that he was disqualified. From the knowledge of the fact that Blizard was mayor and returning officer was every elector bound to know as matter of law that he was disqualified? I agree that ignorance of the law does not excuse. But I think that in Martindale vs. Falkner, Maule, J., correctly explains the rule of law. He says: "There is no presumption in this country that every person knows the law; it would be contrary to common sense and reason if it were so. In Jones vs. Randall, Dunning, arguendo, says: 'The laws of this country are clear, evident, and certain; all the judges know the laws, and knowing them administer justice with uprightness and integrity.'" But Lord Mansfield, in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "As to the certainty of the law mentioned by Mr. Dunning, it would be very hard upon the profession if the law was so certain that everybody knew it; the misfortune is that it is so uncertain that it costs much money to know what it is, even in the last resort." It was a necessary ground of the decision in that case that a party may be ignorant of the law. The rule is that ignorance of the law shall not excuse a man, or relieve him from the consequences of a crime or from liability upon a contract. There are many cases where the giving up a doubtful point of law has been held to be a good consideration for a promise to pay money. Numerous other instances might be cited to show that there may be such a thing as a doubtful point of law. If there were not, there would be no need of courts of appeal, the existence of which shows that judges may be ignorant of law. That being so, it would be too much to hold that ordinary people are bound to know in what particular court such and such a practice does or does not prevail.

I take this to be the rule of law applicable to this case. I think the knowledge that Blizard was the mayor is clearly brought home to every voter, but the question is not merely whether every vote given for him was thrown away in the sense that it was given for a disqualified candidate—in that sense it was undoubtedly thrown away; but whether it was thrown away in the same manner as if the vote had been given for a dead man, or had not been given at all. I think that where a voter is informed that a certain circumstance in point of law disqualifies a candidate, even although he may hold a different opinion, yet if he afterward votes for that candidate, his vote is thrown away. In the present election a voter may possibly have been told by the one party that Blizard being returning officer could not be elected, by the other party that he could be; if this could be shown the vote would be thrown away; but the case merely shows as a fact that Blizard was returning officer, from which a lawyer would be aware that he was disqualified, and, in my opinion, the knowledge that Blizard was returning officer does not in law necessarily involve the knowledge that he was disqualified.

It must be observed that when a voter is said to have notice of disqualification in a candidate, the word notice is ambiguous. In Rex vs. Hawkins the question is thus stated: "If the law be that at the election of corporate officers the votes given for an incapable candidate, after notice of such incapacity, are to be considered as thrown away, i. e., as if the voters had not given any vote at all, then this will be a good election of Spicer; unless the time when notice of his incapacity was given, namely, after two persons had given their votes for each of the candidates can be considered as making any difference."

The general proposition, that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered as the same as if the persons had not voted at all, is supported by the cases of Reg. vs. Boscawen, Easter, 13 Anne; Reg. vs. Withers, Easter, 8 Geo. 2; Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, M. 15, Geo. 2; all which are cited in Cowper, 537, in Rex vs. Munday, in the first Boscawen vs. Roberts the two candidates had an equal number of votes; but because Boscawen was incapable, the votes given for him were considered as thrown away, and the other duly elected.

In the second case, Withers had 5 votes out of 11; and the other 6 refusing to vote at all, the court held Withers duly elected, and that the 6 who refused to vote were virtually consenting to the election of Withers.

In the third case, Taylor, Bigg, and Kingston were candidates. Bigg was objected to, as a disqualified person; notwithstanding which, Bigg had 14 votes, Taylor 13, and Kingston only 1. There Lee, C. J., at nisi prius directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the electors had notice of Bigg's want of qualification they should find for the plaintiff, (that was Taylor, who had only 13 votes,) because Bigg, not being qualified, was to be considered as a person not in esse, and the voting for him a mere nullity. The jury found for the plaintiff; and the court, on motion for a new trial, agreed with the law as laid down by Lee, C. J., and refused a new trial.

The whole of this reasoning goes to show that those who voted for the disqualified candidate, knowing of his disqualification, were to be treated as voting for a person not in esse, so that there must be an actual knowledge of his disqualification in law. And Lord Eldon similarly grounds his decision on the fact that the majority knowingly voted for a disqualified candidate, or, as he terms it, "for a dead man." Certainly he seems to have thought that the ratio decidendi was the knowledge of the disqualification in law, and that the votes given with that knowledge were mere nullities.

In Reg. vs. Coaks, Lord Campbell, C. J., says: "Blake was, in fact, a candidate, but he was an alderman, and, therefore, ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors. Now it is the law, both the common law and the parliamentary law, and it seems to me also common sense, that if an elector will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all or voted for a non-existent person; as it has been said, as if he gave his vote for the man in the moon."

It seems to me that Mr. Campbell's opinion was this: The reason why the vote given for a dead man is not to be counted is that the voter knowingly votes for a person whom he knows to be incapable of election, and therefore the result is the same as if he had not voted at all. Voting for a dead man or for the man in the moon are expressions showing that, in order to make the vote a nullity, there must be willful persistence against actual knowledge. But it does not seem to me consistent with either justice, or common sense, or common law to say that, because these voters were aware of a certain circumstance, they were necessarily aware of the disqualification arising from that circumstance, and that therefore their votes are to be considered as mere nullities. Upon this ground I do not think that the votes given in ignorance that Blizard was in law disqualified are made out to have been wholly thrown away, and that Moore is entitled to act as town councilor.

Under these circumstances the election ought to be considered as void and a new election ought to be held.

LUSH J. I am of the same opinion. We have not the materials before us to enable us to find out whether the prosecutor had a majority over the legal votes given for his opponent, the notice of disqualification not having been published before the election commenced; therefore it becomes necessary to ascertain what is the principle governing the decisions in the cases cited, in which it was held that votes given for a candidate whom the voters knew to be disqualified are thrown away, that is, are to be treated as if they had not been given at all. The fact that Blizard, who presided at the election, was mayor, was known to all the voters; and it is necessary to decide whether the vote, given by an elector who knows a fact which, by construction of law, operates as a disqualification of the candidate, is of itself a mere nullity, or whether, in order to nullify the vote, it is necessary that the elector should be aware not only of the fact, but also of the legal consequences annexed to it.

For the reasons given by my brother Blackburn, I am of opinion that it is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only, but that it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew the fact amounted to a disqualification. It cannot be said in all cases that the mere knowledge of a fact which, in law, disqualifies a candidate must be taken to be knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances. That would be a step far beyond the principle in the cases cited, which show that, in order to nullify a vote, it must be proved that the person giving it must have known that he was doing an act of no avail whatever.

A maxim has been cited which, it has been urged, imputes to every person a knowledge of the law. The maxim is ignorantia legis neminem excusat, but there is no maxim which says that, for all intents and purposes, a person must be taken to know the legal consequences of his acts. Here the voter's ignorance of the disqualification of the candidate does not make his vote valid; but it is a very different question whether we are to say now that the candidate who was in the minority is to be declared duly elected, and that those persons who voted for Blizard must be taken to be in the same position as if they had not voted at all, merely because they knew the fact from which, by construction of law, the disqualification arose. Therefore, I am of opinion that the mandamus cannot issue.—The Queen vs. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Tewkesbury; Law Reports, Queen's Bench, 3, 1867–68.

Mr. MORTON. I refer to that case to show that under the broadest construction of the English law it furnishes no ground whatever for this action in Oregon. In whatever way we look at this case, it seems to be utterly indefensible. In the first place the statutes of Oregon require the governor to certify who received the highest number of votes. His duty was simply ministerial. He had no power to judge as to the disqualification of a candidate for elector, for Congress, for supreme judge, for State officers, for any office whatever. He was to certify to the election of the man who had the greatest number of votes, and then the law required that that certificate should be delivered not to an individual member of the electors but to the college of electors, to the electors when assembled, and not to be delivered to a pretender to be carried off by him, but to be delivered to the college which would be to the majority of the electors, but this law of Oregon was expressly violated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I would like to make an inquiry of the Chair first as to the condition of the question before the Senate, and whether the amendment of the Senator from Delaware is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BOGY. There being two amendments, of course the proposition cannot now be amended further. I would like to offer an amendment which I will move later, if necessary.

I do not rise, Mr. President, after this question has been discussed so lengthily and so ably, to do more than to add a few words to vindicate the conduct of the governor of Oregon. In my estimation, he did his duty with perfect honesty; he could have done nothing less and be a faithful public officer.

Much learning has been displayed on this question; many authorities have been cited and very able arguments have been advanced upon both sides; but at last the question is simply this: An election was held in the State of Oregon for electors of President and Vice-President, that State being entitled to three electors. One of the candidates was clearly, beyond all doubt, beyond all dispute, (and no man denies that fact,) ineligible because he held an office of profit and trust under the Government of the United States. That being so, he was clearly ineligible. Yet he received a majority of the votes cast in the State of Oregon, a majority of 1,049 votes. That fact is made to appear by the returns. The next step which has to be taken necessarily is the evidence of the election of these electors. That evidence is supplied by the governor of the State. He, under his oath of office, is bound to give the certificate not to the person who has received the highest number of votes, but to the person or persons who shall have been elected. Now can it be said by anybody that Mr. Watts was elected when the Constitution says that he cannot be elected, and that he is not eligible? In that case what is the governor to do? To certify that Mr. Watts had been elected was to certify to that which was false. He could not have done it under his oath of office, because Watts had not been elected and could not be elected. He was not eligible any more than if he had been a non-resident of the State and never had been in the State. He was disqualified by the Constitution, and the votes given for him were a mere nullity. Gentlemen may say what they please, quote as many authorities and as much law as they please, and argue as they please, the fact is that he was not elected because he was not eligible, and not capable of being elected.

What was the governor to do? He could not certify to his election. These gentlemen say he had then no right, under the decisions made both in this country and in England and in accordance with the weight of authority, to give the certificate to the next highest person who had been voted for. Now, without arguing that point at all, it is undoubted that there has been very great diversity of opinion on that subject.

Some contend that it turns upon the point as to the knowledge of the voters in Oregon whether Mr. Watts was eligible or not. I do not believe that that is the law in a case of this kind. I do not believe that that is the law where the person voted for is ineligible by the fundamental law of the country. Everybody is presumed to know the provisions of the Constitution. Whether they knew them in Oregon or not, it is presumed to be known as well there as everywhere else, and as he was ineligible, the voters were presumed to know the fact. Being clearly ineligible, the votes given to him are nullities and amount to nothing at all. Now the State of Oregon is entitled to three votes. The governor of the State by his action could secure three votes to the State, or by his non-action the State would have but two votes.

Gentlemen argue that under the law of Oregon the remaining two electors could have supplied the vacancy by an election. The Senator from Oregon argues that at length; and the Senator from Indiana argues it with ability and with great zeal; nevertheless, in my humble opinion, these two gentlemen are entirely mistaken as to the law of Oregon. It seems to me that this law is so plain that it is not a matter to be argued. It has been read very often; but as it is the turning point in this case, I will read it again:

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.

The Senator from Oregon commented with severity upon the change of language used by the governor of Oregon in a telegram, I presume, sent to a paper in New York. I believe the construction of the governor of Oregon is entirely correct. I will now explain my understanding of this law:

If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector—

There must have been "an elector." The Senator from Indiana speaks of the law of Missouri being different, because it says "an elector appointed." Although the word "appointed" is not here, it means it. Why? Because a man cannot be an elector unless he has been appointed to be an elector. The vacancy to be filled may be occasioned by death. By the death of whom? Of the elector. So by "refusal to act." Of whom? Of the elector. "Neglect to attend?" Whose neglect? The elector's. "Or otherwise." Whether an elector is prevented by death, neglect, or otherwise prevented, that vacancy, so occasioned, is to be filled; and whatever may be the cause why the elector does not attend, whether on account of death, resignation, refusal to attend, insanity, matters not. It might have been insanity. He might have got drunk and been unable to go there and attend.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me a moment to ask a question?

Mr. BOGY. I am willing.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Missouri says there must be a vacancy in the office of elector. I want to know from the Senator if the office of elector is not a continuing office existing all the time in each of the States to the number of the representation of that State in Congress, and if there may not be a vacancy by a failure to elect the requisite number by the people just as much as in any other way?

Mr. BOGY. I have no question that the law could be drawn to provide for just such a case as took place in Oregon; but take the law as it is, and that law says that if there be a vacancy in the office of an elector—not a vacancy in the electoral college, but in the office of an elector—presuming, admitting, and the whole argument is founded on this, that there must have been an elector who has died, resigned, or refused to act, then there is a vacancy because he has died or refuses to act, and so he creates a vacancy by his act or he neglects to attend and he creates a vacancy because he does not attend; and who in the name of common sense can give any other construction to this? There is no lawyer in the world acting as a judge who would not so hold, not even the Senator from Indiana; but I will not say that because he is a judge; he is the chairman of the committee to investigate this matter, and I am a little astonished—I say it without being his censor at all—it seems to me a very strange position for the chairman of the committee who is to be the presiding judge to pass on this question that he should construe it before the case is submitted to him, before it has been argued, and before the facts are presented. We know his opinion beforehand.

Mr. President, there is no room for doubt. On a question of this kind submitted to an impartial tribunal there would be no room for doubt. It must be a vacancy of an elector occasioned by death, occasioned by refusal to act, occasioned by neglect to attend, or otherwise occasioned; nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a vacancy in the office, is it not?

Mr. BOGY. A vacancy in the office, of course. If an elector has died, I take it, his office is effectually vacant.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or if there has been none elected, then it is effectually vacant, is it not? It is a continuing office, existing all the time, as long as the Government stands.

Mr. BOGY. It may not continue. If there had been but three candidates in that State and one of them had not been eligible, certainly but two could have been elected and one could not have been.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would there not then be a vacancy in the office of elector in Oregon?

Mr. BOGY. I do not know that there would be. Under this law there would not be. If the people of Oregon had voted for two electors, being entitled to three, although in fact there would be a vacancy, in law there would not be under this statute. Certainly there would be no vacancy there, because if a certain man had never been elected he could not have died while elector, he could not have refused to act, he could not have neglected to attend, or he could not otherwise have been kept away from that place, because he never existed. The law of Oregon and the law of Missouri, although not in the same language, are virtually the same. The law of Vermont, the law of Rhode Island, the law of Oregon, the law of Missouri, and the law of Michigan—I have examined them all—are substantially the same.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator one other question? The Senator, I concede, will presume that it was within the province of the Legislature of the State of Oregon to determine what does and what does not constitute a vacancy in the office of presidential elector or any State office in that State?

Mr. BOGY. That it is competent for the Legislature to provide?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, what shall or shall not constitute a vacancy. The Senator will concede that, I presume?

Mr. BOGY. I not only concede that but I go further; I think the law of Congress on that subject is a nullity.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now I want to know if the Legislature of the State of Oregon has not provided in the very code on the Senator's desk as to what shall and what shall not constitute a vacancy, and if it does not include in the class of cases the case where the election is void, where a person for instance is voted for who is ineligible. Does not the act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon plainly provide that in a case of that kind, when the void election is declared void by a competent tribunal, then there is a vacancy in that office?

Mr. BOGY. The Senator, I think, is a very singular logician or I am, one or the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. That may be.

Mr. BOGY. I admit that under the Constitution of the United States clearly the States have the right to provide for a case of this kind. The States have the sole right to provide the mode and manner of appointing electors. The Legislatures have the right to appoint the electors themselves. The Legislature of a State might authorize the governor to appoint the electors. They might authorize any man in the State to appoint the electors. That power is given to them without limit. Having the power to appoint electors, as a matter of course they have the right to provide how any vacancy may be filled. There is no question about that. While I admit that, I do not admit that the Legislature of Oregon has done that thing. That is the point. I think they have failed to do it. I think they failed to do it in Rhode Island; I think they failed also in Vermont.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call the Senator's attention to that provision of the statute which provides what shall constitute a vacancy.

Mr. BOGY. It is what I have been trying to read. I have been trying to get it into the Senator's head.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is not reading from the same statute I am talking about. There is another statute in the same book, on a separate page, in a different section, which goes on to provide what shall constitute a vacancy, and one of the cases included in that provision is where the election of the person voted for is void for any reason.

Mr. BOGY. Will the gentleman show me that law?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will with pleasure. It is on page 709 of the code of Oregon. It provides as follows:

Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;
2. His resignation;
3. His removal;
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village, for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
5. His conviction of any infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.—General Laws of Oregon, chapter 13, title vii, section 45, page 709, 710.

Mr. BOGY. Now, Mr. President, that just shows how weak this case is. The other law in relation to electors stands by itself, a law complete in itself, made for a very different purpose, and it is attempted to be sustained by a law providing for the mere ministerial officers of the State. Under this law many of the offices in Oregon no doubt might be filled either by the governor or the Legislature as the law provides if there be a vacancy caused by death, resignation, or ineligibility; but does that control the law standing by itself, made for a purpose independent, important, which is intended to cover the whole ground and which is complete in itself? I hope the Senator will excuse me if I am compelled to call that pettifogging. I do not mean to be offensive, but it is nothing else. The law in relation to electors stands by itself, intended to provide for the election of the highest officers in the Government. The office of elector is the highest office in our Government. It is in some respects higher than the Presidency because it makes the President. In accordance with the theory of our Government the elector was to be an independent man voting for whom he pleased, and the position of an elector in theory was to be the most elevated, the most dignified, the most responsible position that a citizen of this country could hold under the Constitution. The law of Oregon, like the law of all the States, provides that if one of the persons chosen to this high office is unable to discharge the duty imposed upon him by law the remaining members of the college of electors shall fill his vacancy. But there must have been an election. How was it in Vermont? I have not the law of Vermont before me, but I have read that law and there the Legislature was called together for the purpose of passing a law authorizing the vacancy to be filled in a case precisely similar to the case in Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is mistaken. The law of Vermont was dissimilar to that of Oregon, was not like it. The Legislature were called together and they made it like it, and then the other electors filled the vacancy. That was all there was about it.

Mr. BOGY. It is not a very proper way to argue for one gentleman to assert a thing to be a fact and another to deny it to be a fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply think the Senator was mistaken.

Mr. BOGY. I said the law of Vermont was substantially the same as that of Oregon, not in the same words. These laws are not in the same words, but throughout the United States the law upon this subject is pretty much similar for a very good reason. Many years ago nobody ever dreamed that this question would ever come up. It was supposed that a vacancy in the office of elector might be created by death, by resignation, by inability to attend, or otherwise; but it was not believed that persons would run for the office who were not eligible; and hence no provision was made for a vacancy of that kind. There is none in my State, none in Vermont, none in Rhode Island, none in Michigan. I have the law of Michigan before me. I say, according to my understanding of the law of Vermont, it is the same as the law of Oregon. There a person was voted for as an elector who was not eligible. The Legislature was called upon to assemble for the purpose of passing a law authorizing that vacancy to be filled. That law was passed under the act of Congress found in the Revised Statutes, and I think it is a very doubtful question, one which I intend by an amendment to this resolution at the proper time to submit to this Committee on Privileges and Elections. We might get the opinion of the chairman of that committee before he starts to investigate the matter. The law of Rhode Island is virtually the same. Now look at the decision of the supreme court of that State on that very subject. The supreme court of Rhode Island, upon a law virtually and substantially the same as the law of Oregon and of every other State, says:

Before any person can decline under this section—

A section authorizing the electors of that State to fill a vacancy in case an elector declines or is prevented by any cause from serving—he must be elected.

So say the supreme court of Rhode Island.

And no person can be elected who is ineligible or, in other words, incapable of being elected. Resignation, said Lord Cockburn, chief justice, in The Queen vs. Blizzard, L. R., 2 Q. B., 55, implies that the person resigning has been elected unto the office he resigns. A man cannot resign that which he is not entitled to and which he has no right to occupy. We think the disqualification is not removed by the resignation of the office or trust unless the office is resigned before the election. The language of the Constitution is that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. Under our law the election by the people constitutes the appointment.

This is the decision of the supreme court of Rhode Island, made but a short time ago, on the first day of this month, in a case I may say precisely the same. A person was voted for in that State who held an office of trust and profit, and under the constitution was ineligible. The case was submitted to the supreme court, and this court made the decision I have just read to the Senate saying that a person cannot resign that of which he is not possessed, and in that case, as in the case of Vermont, the Legislature passed a law to supply whatever was necessary.

The case of Oregon has been decided by the action of Vermont and Rhode Island beyond a doubt. The cases are in every respect the same. I have read them all. They are not in the same language, but substantially alike, and present a question worthy of being examined, not only for the effect it may have upon the present contest now pending, but as a guide to those who may come after us, and who may have to pass upon similar cases, and I regret very much, that a question of this importance, peculiarly requiring cool, calm, impartial investigation, has been so prejudged in this body. The proper way would have been to refer it to the committee, and let the committee be impartial, if a committee of this body can be impartial.

Now, sir, a word with regard to the State of Missouri, so that that case may not be prejudged. In Missouri we had no doubt that General Frost was eligible to the office of elector, and at the proper time we will state the case before the committee. It is not worth while to argue it in advance; but there can be no doubt that he was eligible under the Constitution, under the law, under the fourteenth amendment, and under all conditions and circumstances, as much as any other citizen of the United States could possibly be; but so as to avoid any controversy, under our law he failed to attend and his vacancy was properly filled. Nevertheless, if he were not eligible there would be no vacancy such as was contemplated by the law of Missouri, because no elector had been appointed in that case standing exactly as the law of Oregon stands. If it turn out on investigation that General Frost was not eligible, then Missouri will lose one of her votes, as I contend under the condition of things Oregon would have lost one of her votes if the governor, acting I have no doubt from high patriotic motives, had not used his official power to secure to the State its due weight in the electoral college. If it be true—and who denies it?—that Mr. Watts was not eligible, Oregon had voted then for but two electors, and if it be so, as I contend, that under the law of Oregon this vacancy could not be filled by the two remaining electors, it became the duty of the governor to use the power of his office to preserve to his State its due weight in the electoral college, which was three votes, and if he had not done so Oregon would have been cut down to two votes. To secure that he was compelled to do that which he did do. I contend that he was compelled to do it under the law. In addition to the law he certainly must have been influenced as a patriotic man by what was due to his State, for otherwise that State by the action of the people of Oregon themselves would have been cut down to two votes.

Now it is not worth while here, and there is nothing gained by it I will tell the Senator from Oregon, to try to make this a fight as against Governor Grover personally. I do not know him; but I have seen nothing that has come before my eyes that tells me in the slightest manner that he did not do his duty. On the contrary, we do know that he took a long time to investigate; we do know that he consulted the best legal minds of the country; and that he sent away to the valley of the Mississippi for the opinion of one of the best jurists in that valley. My friend from Indiana may laugh at him as much as he pleases. I know no lawyer in Indiana his superior as a lawyer. My friend spoke rather lightly of Indiana a little while ago, for he said that even in Indiana this would not be law.

Mr. MORTON. I said the Indiana case would not go to the extent claimed here at all.

Mr. BOGY. We do know that Governor Grover took this case under advisement for a long time, that he consulted the best legal minds in the State, and also one of the best legal minds in the valley of the Mississippi. I have not the honor of knowing Judge Hoadly personally, but the Senator may know him, and if he does not know him personally he knows that he is a man of fine reputation, one of the finest intellects in our section of the country, and one of the best lawyers.

Mr. MORTON. I never heard of it.

Mr. BOGY. There are many things you and I never heard of. [Laughter.] It is nevertheless true. The Senator has been out of the profession many years, and I doubt if he is familiar with the men who have acquired distinction in the law in the last ten years. They have grown up since he has become a public man. The fact is that Judge Hoadly in the city of Cincinnati stands the peer of the best lawyers in that city. Now in view of all these facts that are known, it is not worth while to be finding fault and trying to make it appear that this gentleman occupying the high office of governor of that distant State has been guilty even of telling lies as the Senator from Oregon has intimated this morning, of telling horrible lies unworthy not only of a governor but unworthy of any man.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not use any such language.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator did not use that language, I admit; I did not intend to say that he did; but his remarks were intended to make that impression before the country that he had stated falsely with regard to the number of persons who must have known that Mr. Watts was disqualified, that in making that statement he stated that which he knew was untrue, and that in plain language was a lie.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply stated the facts. If they convict Mr. Grover of misrepresentation, I cannot help it.

Mr. BOGY. That may be so. His effort was made before this Chamber to show that this officer holding this high office had been guilty of telling that which was not true in stating facts. Of course the Senator did not use the word "lie," but that was the amount of it. It is not worth while to argue the case in that way. To use the language of the Senator from Indiana, "We cannot elect a President in that manner." Ah, sir, there are many ways that modern times have taught us how Presidents are attempted to be elected; but they are novel. The old way was for the people to vote in their respective States, those votes to be counted, the electors to meet and the majority of the electors appointed to speak the voice of the people of the United States. But that day has passed. How is it in Louisiana? How is it in South Carolina? How is it in Florida? One of the men sent there by the President of the United States in a letter published but yesterday admits himself that the State of Florida voted for Tilden. His own report made to the President of the United States, which ought to have been sent here as the Louisiana report was sent, but which was not sent, virtually admits that Florida cast her vote for Tilden. In the report published but yesterday Mr. Barlow admits that Florida voted for Tilden. We know the fact that, as far as the vote is concerned, the people of Louisiana voted, by a majority of about eight thousand votes, for Tilden. And yet what has become of that vote? A returning board there is commended; its decisions are held equal to those of the Supreme Court of the United States, and when the governor of Oregon, acting in obedience to law, doing that which he was compelled to do and could do nothing else, is censured and is held up here as a man who has disgraced his high office and acted unworthily.

Ah, Mr. President, that will not do. The people of the United States, it seems to me, expect that we in Congress will meet this question in a different way. As far as I am individually concerned, if I am satisfied that Mr. Watts is eligible under that law and that the remaining electors had the right or the power under that law to fill that vacancy, if it can be so called, I, as a Senator, would give to the State of Oregon three votes for Mr. Hayes and would not hesitate at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator object to giving way for a motion to adjourn? It is so late that we shall not be able to get a vote to-day, and I do not think it worth while for us to remain any longer.

Mr. BOGY. I am nearly through now; but if I start again in the morning, I cannot tell how long I shall talk. [Laughter.] But I will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be, and he is hereby, allowed the same compensation per diem now allowed to the clerks of the other standing committees.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Has that resolution the indorsement of the Committee of Accounts?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer that question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] if the resolution has had the indorsement of the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have no doubt it would be indorsed by that committee if necessary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think it had better be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not think it at all necessary to refer it.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to the resolution.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics for 1875, with the accompanying engravings, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the Senate, and 500 for the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioners.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that a concurrent resolution from the Senate providing for printing extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the Louisiana election be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read, and referred to the Committee on Printing;

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 10,000 additional copies of the letter of the President, with the accompanying documents, on the election in Louisiana be printed; of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 7,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives; and that there be also printed and stitched or bound with the same the memorial of Messrs. BOGY, MCDONALD, and STEVENSON and the papers referred to therein on the same subject.

FRANCIS A. PAGE.

Mr. MUTCHLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to Francis A. Page, an employé of this House on the "soldiers' roll," the amount of his salary as disabled soldier from July 15, 1876, the date when he was last paid, to December 1, 1876.

CHARLES F. CHANDLER.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 722) for the relief of Charles F. Chandler be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Patents.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let it be understood that this bill shall not be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be brought back except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I believe that the rule refers only to the introduction of House bills.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATOR OF WILLIAM A. LLOYD.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 784) for the relief of Enoch Totten, administrator of the estate of William A. Lloyd, deceased, be taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee of Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider the reference of this bill will be laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will probably be called during the morning hour.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes after twelve o'clock; and the first business in order is the calling of committees for reports.

UNITED STATES COURT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 966) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit court of the United States at Bay City, Michigan, reported a substitute therefor, (H. R. No. 4246;) which was read a first and second time.

The substitute provides that there shall be two terms of the United States district and circuit court for the eastern district of Michigan held at Bay City, Michigan, in said district, each year from and after the passage of the act, the time and length of the terms to be fixed by the judges of said court respectively.

The second section provides that the clerk of the district court of the eastern district of Michigan, the marshal, and the district attorney for said district, shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts; and the clerk and marshal are each authorized to appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices at Bay City, and who shall in the absence of their principals do and perform all the duties appertaining to those offices respectively; provided that the local authorities shall furnish a suitable court-room where the court shall be held without cost or expense therefor to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. SEELYE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 346) authorizing payment to certain citizens of New Mexico for Indian depredations; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SUPPLIES TO SIOUX INDIANS OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. SEELYE. I am also directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 325) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amount due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof. As there is a minority as well as a majority report in this case, I move that this bill instead of being laid on the table be placed on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to present the views of the minority on the bill just reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.]

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the majority and minority reports printed.

JOHN H. PICKERING.

Mr. VAN VORHES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably a joint resolution (H. R. No. 149) for the relief of John H. Pickering; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HILLBORN C. MILLER.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1687) to change the date of muster-in as second lieutenant of Hillborn C. Miller, late of Company G, First Ohio Heavy Artillery; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE G. GUSTIN.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of George G. Gustin; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

PATRICK NOONAN.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Patrick Noonan, Company G, Fifth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to Private Patrick Noonan, Company G, Fifth United States Infantry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by him at the burning of the stables at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, on the 23d day of January, 1875, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey convened under provisions of General Order No. 13,

War Department, by Special Order No. 29, headquarters Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, of date of March 9, 1875.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF CLOTHING TO UNITED STATES CAVALRY.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) authorizing the issue of clothing to Company A, Second Regiment United States Cavalry; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to fifty enlisted men of Company A, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by them at the fire which occurred in the camp of Company A, Second Cavalry, on the 16th day of July, 1874, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey, convened under Special Order No. 138, headquarters Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, of date of July 17, 1874.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF CLOTHING TO PRIVATES HEGNER AND COLLINS.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Francis Hegner, Company F, Seventh Cavalry, and Private John C. Collins, Company G, Seventh Cavalry; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to Private Francis Hegner, Company F, Seventh United States Cavalry, and Private John C. Collins, of Company G, Seventh United States Cavalry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by them respectively at the burning of the cavalry stable at Fort Abraham Lincoln, Dakota Territory, November 10, 1874, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey, convened by Special Orders No. 213, headquarters Fort Abraham Lincoln, Dakota Territory, of the date November 11, 1874.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Are these joint resolutions accompanied by reports?

Mr. COOK. They are.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. One of the reports, then, should be read, so it may appear of record upon what grounds the Committee on Military Affairs reports for action at this time these joint resolutions.

Mr. COOK. These cases are all based upon communications from the War Department, which set forth all the facts, inclosing the report of the board of survey in each case. The executive documents are numbers 52, 53, 54, and 55 of the last session of Congress. The Committee on Military Affairs have examined the evidence in each case, and are satisfied that the resolutions should pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SERGEANT HERMAN THEUNE.

Mr. COOK also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergeant Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to Sergeant Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by him at the burning of the old post-hospital at Fort Whipple, Arizona Territory, on the 13th day of November, 1874.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT READING MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1950 a bill (H. R. No. 4247) for the transfer of the Fort Reading military reservation in Shasta County, California, to the Interior Department, and authorizing the sale of the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

DONATIONS OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 976) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Port Huron, Michigan, certain condemned cannon and balls for a soldiers' monument in Lake Side Cemetery; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that that bill may be recommitted that I may have an opportunity to appear before the committee.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I have no objection to that.

The bill was accordingly recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 849) granting four condemned cannon and sixteen cannon-balls to the Soldiers' Monumental Association of Salem, Ohio, for monumental purposes; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I ask that that bill be put upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1996) donating condemned cannon to Post No. 71, Grand Army of the Republic, at Holyoke, Massachusetts; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

Mr. SEELYE. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion of Mr. SEELYE was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2911) donating certain condemned cannon to the soldiers' monument at Muscatine, Iowa; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

Mr. TUFTS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion of Mr. TUFTS was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the following bills, and the same were severally ordered to lie on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The bill (H. R. No. 3935) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Boston, Massachusetts;

The bill (H. R. No. 698) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Colchester Monument Association of Colchester, Connecticut, for monumental purposes;

The bill (H. R. No. 845) condemning two pieces of brass ordnance for a soldiers' monument at Caldwell, Ohio;

The bill (H. R. No. 697) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to Ledyard Monumental Association of Ledyard, Connecticut, for monumental purposes;

The bill (H. R. No. 1228) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to Samuel Orr and Philip Harnbrook;

The bill (H. R. No. 3661) donating condemned cannon for monumental purposes to Post No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, of Taunton, Massachusetts;

The bill (H. R. No. 3697) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the commissioners of Forest Park, Saint Louis, Missouri, eight condemned cannon to be used in constructing the base of the statue of Ex-Attorney-General Edward Bates;

The bill (H. R. No. 848) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the corporate authorities of the town of Oberlin, Ohio, for monumental purposes;

The bill (H. R. No. 1831) to authorize the Secretary of War to appropriate condemned ordnance for the erection of a monument to the memory of the soldiers and sailors of Orange County, New York, who fell during the late war;

The bill (H. R. No. 3286) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to monumental purposes of the Grand Army of the Republic post organization at Lawrence, Massachusetts; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3353) donating condemned cannon to the town of Winchester, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of Jonas A. Champney and 60 others, for one condemned cannon and two cannon-balls for ornamenting the burial ground, South Adams, Massachusetts; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES FOR CAMP AND GARRISON EQUIPAGE.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, to whom was referred Executive Document No. 788, relating to expenditures for camp and garrison equipage, reported that the legislation referred to therein having passed the House, it is returned with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and the executive document was ordered to lie on the table.

EQUALIZATION BOUNTIES.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the preamble and resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, in favor of the bill equalizing bounties, reported that the legislation asked for having already passed the House, they are returned with the recommendation that they lie on the table.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and they were ordered to lie on the table.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with adverse recommendations, the following papers; and the same were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

Resolutions of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, requesting the President and Secretary of War to have Newport Barracks, Kentucky, again occupied as a military post, and that the troops and military band be returned to said post.

Letter from the Secretary of War, with reports from chiefs of bureau of War Department, from Lieutenant-General Sheridan, with indorsement of General of the Army on the House bill No. 2935;

A bill (H. R. No. 2446) to correct the date of commission of a certain officer of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 3253) to change the position in the Army Register of the name of Walter F. Halleck, first lieutenant, retired;

A letter from the Secretary of War relative to the loan of tents to Mexican war veterans; and

A bill (S. No. 73) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866.

Mr. STRAIT, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of William Carruthers;

The petition of Captain J. C. Bacon and Lieutenant R. A. Davis, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry;

The petition of Louis Sontagg, of Company I, Third New Jersey Cavalry;

The petition of Jacob Taylor, for services as private in Company K, First Missouri Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 206) to amend the record of military service of Seth Bonney; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2056) directing the Second Auditor of the Treasury to settle the pay and bounty accounts of Moses Lord.

EMANUEL KLAUSER.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4248) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser, late corporal Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of mutiny against Emanuel Klauser, late corporal Company H, Fifty-fourth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CATHERINE HARRIS.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation House bill No. 2606, for the relief of Catherine Harris.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Catherine Harris, widow of Matthias Harris, late a chaplain in the United States Army, the amount of pay and allowances due him as a chaplain from the 5th day of February, 1864, to the 10th day of October, 1864.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let us have read the report accompanying that bill.

The report was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT DODGE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1540, a bill (H. R. No. 4249) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Fort Dodge military reservation in Kansas to the Dodge City Town Company; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to sell at public auction to the highest bidder, after duly advertising time, place, and terms of sale in two newspapers that will give fair notice of the sale, all that part of the Fort Dodge military reservation in Kansas lying west of a north and south line extending from the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of section 25, Township 26 south, range 25 west, due south to the Arkansas River, and containing one hundred and ninety-four acres more or less; and before exposing said tract of land for sale the Secretary of War shall cause the land to be duly appraised by three disinterested and competent persons, and shall not sell said tract of land for less than its appraised value.

Mr. FORT. I make the point of order that that bill should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

FORT CAMERON MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2248, a bill (H. R. No. 4258) to provide for the payment for certain improvements on lands now embraced in the military reservation of Fort Cameron, in the Territory of Utah; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to appoint a commission, composed of three Army officers, whose duty it shall be to investigate the claim of W. J. Allred and Alonzo A. Noon for improvements made upon lands now embraced in the military reservation at Fort Cameron, in the Territory of Utah, and to estimate and report upon the value of said improvements. In making such estimate of value of improvements, the board of officers may take into consideration the proceedings of a board of officers who assembled at Fort Cameron February 15, 1875, and such other evidence as may be brought before them, and report also upon the title of the claimants to the land embraced in the reservation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The morning hour, I believe, has expired.

The SPEAKER. It has. The bill goes over as unfinished business.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a point of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. What point of order?

Mr. CONGER. That the bill proposes to dispose of public property.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be regarded as pending; and the decision of the Chair will be reserved till the bill comes up again.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Committee of Ways and Means have directed me to report the following resolution; upon which I ask the previous question:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns on Saturday, the 23d instant, it shall adjourn to meet on Wednesday, the 27th instant; and when it adjourns on Saturday, the 30th instant, it shall adjourn to meet on Wednesday, January 3, 1877.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that this proposition is not fair play toward the western members who may desire to go home. An adjournment of the kind proposed will interfere very seriously with any work that may be intended to be done in the House, while at the same time it will keep members here who may not desire to be absent if there is a possibility of any public business being done. The gentleman from New York must see at once that under this resolution we cannot go home; and at the same time he is interrupting the business of the House to such an extent that little can be done.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The Committee of Ways and Means gave very mature consideration to this question, and considered the very points which my friend from Iowa suggests. But in view of the exigency of the times and the condition of the country, it was supposed that the duty of the House was to remain in session with the exception of two brief adjournments for Christmas and New Year's, which, of course, we all expect. This is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. O no.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. So I understood. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] says "O no." I believe we had one dissenting vote.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 110, noes 57.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOOD, of New York, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 62.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question then recurred on ordering the main question.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to say that it is the understanding of the committee that on Saturday the House will simply meet and adjourn without transacting any business.

The SPEAKER. That will be within the province of the House on that day to determine.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. But I think that is generally understood; so that if gentlemen desire to leave on Friday it probably will not be necessary for them to remain here.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has alluded to the action of the committee, I desire to say that some members of the committee were of the opinion that if the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the other day the matter of privilege, should report within the next few days on that subject the House might take its usual adjournment, and that until the committee shall report it is rather premature to undertake to settle the question of adjournment.

The main question was ordered.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 92, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Wigginton, Wike, and Woodburn—76.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. GOODIN stated that the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. LANE, was absent at the bed-side of a sick friend.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANK C. HOPKINS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House to Frank C. Hopkins the sum of $600 for services rendered as clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means in the absence of the clerk of that committee during the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TONNAGE AND IMPORTS OVERCHARGE.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4250) to provide remedies for overcharge of duties on tonnage or imports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTH PASS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Major Comstock, of the Engineer Corps, on the condition of the works on the South Pass of the Mississippi; which, on motion of Mr. CONGER, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. MONTEITH.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommending an appropriation for the relief of John B. Monteith; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONSULAR OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of the names of consular officers, not citizens of the United States, to whom salaries have been paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CLAIM OF R. R. WALLER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, from the Adjutant-General, a report of the claim of R. R. Waller, late lieutenant Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, indefinitely on account of illness.

To Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS, for two weeks on account of important business.

To Mr. BALLOU, from the 28th instant to the 3d of January.

To Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the 20th instant to the 5th of January.

To Mr. MILLER, from the 22d instant to January 4 on account of important business.

To Mr. BRADLEY, for two weeks from to-morrow.

To Mr. BROWN, for ten days on account of important business.

To Mr. BAGBY, until the 1st of January on account of important business.

To Mr. SAVAGE, from the 20th instant to January 5 on account of important business.

To Mr. HENDERSON, for ten days from the 22d instant on account of important business.

To Mr. KELLEY, indefinitely, from the 22d instant.

To Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the 22d instant until January 10 on account of important business.

To Mr. TEESE, from the 21st instant until the 3d of January on account of important business.

To Mr. NASH, for twenty days on account of important business.

To Mr. LEAVENWORTH, for two weeks.

To Mr. TURNEY, for two days from Thursday next on account of important business.

To Mr. MORGAN, from December 27 to December 30, inclusive, on account of important business.

To Mr. WAIT, for ten days from the 21st instant on account of important business.

To Mr. DAVIS, for ten days from Thursday next on account of important business.

To Mr. HARDENBERGH, for ten days from December 22.

To Mr. JOHN REILLY, from to-day until Monday next on account of important business.

To Mr. ADAMS, for one week from the 26th instant on account of important business.

To Mr. GEORGE A. BAGLEY, for ten days from the 27th instant.

Mr. HOLMAN. If these are all granted, it will leave this House without a quorum during that period of time.

The SPEAKER. It is within the power of the House to refuse them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object, but that is the fact.

The SPEAKER. The leave has been granted as requested.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4251) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the bill be printed and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that it be made a special order for consideration therein to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I ask if the bill can be printed so that members can have it in time for consideration to-morrow?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be on our desks to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The motion of Mr. SINGLETON was agreed to.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution in reference to the pay of the employés of the House for action at this time:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to issue to the officers and employés of this House on the 23d instant checks for their salaries for the month of December.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand the effect of this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The effect would be to pay the officers their month's salaries prior to the adjournment over Christmas.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I send to the desk for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 1,900 copies each of report No. 261 of the House select committee at the second session of the Forty-third Congress, on that portion of the President's message relating to the condition of the South, together with the views of GEORGE F. HOAR, W. A. WHEELER, and WILLIAM P. FRYE, of the said committee; also the views of S. S. Marshall, of the said committee, and report No. 101, of Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, to the House of Representatives at the second session of the Forty-third Congress, on behalf of the special committee on that portion of the President's message relating to the condition of the South, to be bound in one volume.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. My motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that.

Mr. FORT. We might as well print the whole history of the war.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

JOHN W. DODD & CO.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4252) for the relief of John W. Dodd & Co., of Indianapolis, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following additional requests for leave of absence:

From Mr. WOOD, of Pennsylvania, from Friday, 22d inst., to January 3.

From Mr. EVANS, for ten days from the 23d to attend to important business.

From Mr. WARNER, for ten days from the 21st instant on account of important business.

From Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, for one week from the 22d instant.

From Mr. SINNICKSON, for two weeks from the 20th instant.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the present I must object to any further leaves of absence.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to these?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do for the present.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HOLMAN withdrew his objection, and the requests were granted.

VENEZUELA MIXED COMMISSION.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to this House all correspondence between this Government and the republic of Venezuela, since the 15th day of May last, in reference to the Venezuela mixed commission, held under the convention of April 25, 1866.

Mr. MONROE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILWAY.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4253) to amend an act entitled "An act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. WILSHIRE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4254) to exempt the State of Arkansas from the provisions of certain sections of chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Mineral Lands and Mining Resources;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

MARY J. SHEPHERD.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4255) for the relief of Mary J. Shepherd; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A. W. GREELY.

Mr. HUNTER also, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4256) for the relief of A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

E. K. DOUGLASS.

Mr. SPENCER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to E. K. Douglass, from June 1 to August 16, inclusive, at the rate of $3 per day for services rendered as a messenger.

Mr. SPENCER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the necessity of causing, at an early day, all that part of the District of Columbia lying north of the cities of Washington and Georgetown to be surveyed, laid out, and mapped, and the necessary monuments set to each block and public square; and also into the propriety of laying out the same in general conformity to the manner in which the city of Washington is laid out; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole be limited to five minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. DURHAM in the chair) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill is to be closed in five minutes.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

The Clerk read the bill, and then proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following to come in as an additional clause to the bill:

For the commencement of a fortification at such place as may be selected on Galveston Island by the Secretary of War, $100,000.

Mr. HALE. I must raise the point of order that that provides for a new work.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know the extent to which the point of order might influence our action. We are engaged in appropriations for fortifications, and I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the point of order be reserved.

Mr. REAGAN. I see by the bill that no appropriation is made for new works. The amendment which I propose here is for the purpose of commencing a new fortification on Galveston Island. Upon that island is the proper seaport of the State of Texas, and a city of some forty thousand inhabitants, with a very considerable commerce, a commerce of more than $30,000,000 annually. It is the port through which the exports and imports of the State of Texas pass, and the trade also of other States and Territories to some extent passes through that seaport and city. That seaport and city is so situated at this time, in view of the great range which is given to artillery by improvements and experience in the last few years, that the city might be at any time bombarded and destroyed by a vessel outside the bar. There is no protection of any description for it. I venture the suggestion that there is no city on the seacoast of the United States of such magnitude and importance, and no place where so great a commerce exists, where there is such imminent danger to the city and its commerce in case of war by a hostile power. No provision has yet been made heretofore for the fortification of this place and the protection of its people and commerce. The city lies immediately upon the open gulf. It is the gateway to the commerce of a single State of more than fifteen hundred thousand population; it is the gateway also to the commerce of additional people, the number of whom I am not able to state at this moment. It is certainly the policy of the Government to see that its great commerce is protected. This is one which requires attention and consideration from the Government. A single man-of-war, in case of hostility with a foreign power, can now destroy that city and its commerce without entering the harbor at all.

I have not time in five minutes to elaborate the subject and state the necessities for action, which I might state if I had more time to. It is sufficient to say that the city of Galveston is a city of considerable size and commerce, with a rapidly growing population in accordance with the growth of the State and its contiguous territory.

It seems to me that, if in time of peace we should prepare for war, there is no more necessary and appropriate provision that could be made than this for the defense of the seacoast and the protection of the commerce and people at this point, who would be exposed in case of war to destruction by a hostile naval force.

I trust therefore that, although I am not able to state enough facts to enable the House to judge as fully as they should do, the House will consent to do this act of justice and necessity for the protection of the commerce and population of one of our most important seaports.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentlemen if his amendment asks for an appropriation that will be available for the protection of the seacoast against Mexico, in case of any difficulty with that Republic. I simply wish to say that anything that looks to conferring strength on our seacoast and preparation for any possible trouble with Mexico ought to be carefully considered by the House, and, although I was not in to hear all the gentleman said, I ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill to oppose no measure that gives reasonable protection to the coast of Texas in case of Mexican hostilities.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that Mexico is particularly formidable by sea. Our contiguity to Mexico is upon the line of the Rio Grande. My object is to give security to this important seacoast town. I have stated that it is a city of more than forty thousand inhabitants; that it is the principal seaport of a State of more than a million and a half of population, rapidly growing, and that it is also the seaport of a portion of the adjoining territory. I state further that the commerce amounts to more than $30,000,000 a year; and I further state that the city of Galveston might be bombarded and destroyed by a foreign vessel without its entering the harbor.

Mr. KASSON. What are the present defenses of the city?

Mr. REAGAN. It has no defenses of any kind at this time. The object of this defense is not with reference to Mexico particularly, or any other power. I offered the amendment with a view to the protection of the city, to save it and its commerce from destruction in case of hostilities with any foreign power.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have here a communication from the War Department upon this subject which I would like to have read in connection with the amendment offered by my colleague.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, in response to letter from the chairman of said committee, report of Chief of Engineers on House bill No. 2089, to "provide for the erection of military fortifications on Galveston Island, in the State of Texas."

The attention of the Military Committee is respectfully invited to the amendment suggested by the Chief of Engineers.

ALPHONSO TAFT,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
March 18, 1876.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 15, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a letter and bill (H. R. No. 2089) received from Hon. H. B. BANNING, chairman Military Committee, House of Representatives, asking the views of this Department as to the necessity of fortifications for the harbor of Galveston, Texas.

The harbor and city of Galveston are not provided with any defenses against an enemy's operations from the decks of his vessels, and are within a few days' steaming from the West Indian ports of maritime nations.

The fortifications proposed by the Department for that city and harbor are an eight-gun battery on Pelican Spit, at an estimated cost of $40,000; an eight-gun battery on Bolivar Point, at an estimated cost of $23,000; and a two-gun battery on Galveston Island, at an estimated cost of $17,000.

The bill, in my judgment, should be passed into a law, first striking out in lines four and five the words "on Galveston Island, in the State of Texas."

It is respectfully suggested that this communication be transmitted to the chairman of the Military Committee of the House.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. ALPHONSO TAFT,
Secretary of War.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 11th instant, I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of the correspondence of March last respecting House bill No. 2089. No further suggestions upon the matter of this bill occur to me at the present moment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. H. B. BANNING,
Chairman Military Committee, House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I send you a bill introduced by General HANCOCK "to provide for the erection of military fortifications on Galveston Island, in the State of Texas." Please advise me of the necessity for such fortifications (if any) and reasons therefor.

Very respectfully, &c.,

H. B. BANNING.

General HUMPHREYS,
United States Engineer.

Mr. HANCOCK. This subject has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I believe the members of that committee are unanimously in favor of the fortification indicated by the correspondence just read. The commercial importance of the city of Galveston is second only to New Orleans on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico. It is a place rapidly increasing in population and business. It has no defensive fortifications whatever, and is entirely exposed to depredations, if there should be any war between the United States Government and any other government, however feeble, it might be. It is so much exposed that it might in a single hour be destroyed.

The amount contemplated by the report of the Chief of Engineer Corps is comparatively insignificant in comparison to the great importance that is apparent for some protection to that rapidly increasing commercial emporium for a vast district of country. This subject has received the full and careful consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, and this committee is in possession of all the facts necessary to enable them to act understandingly in reference to the appropriation of the small amount here asked for, for a fortification that is deemed important both by the committee and by the War Department, as shown by the document just read.

I trust there will be no objection to appropriating the small sum asked, and that it may be incorporated in this bill in such phraseology as will enable the Engineer Department to make the fortification in the manner indicated, that being no doubt best for the purpose desired.

Mr. STEVENSON. What is the amount asked for?

Mr. HANCOCK. The amount named in the amendment is $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a single word only.

Mr. BANNING. I desire merely to suggest that the amount asked for in the bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] was $50,000. That was the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers and the amount that was agreed to by the Committee on Military Affairs. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to modify his amendment so as to make the appropriation $50,000 instead of $100,000, as that was the amount agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the point of order is not disposed of as yet.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to say that $50,000 was the amount recommended both by the Secretary of War and by the Chief of Engineers, when the subject was brought to the attention of the committee by the bill introduced by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] and sent to that committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word. I hope that not an extravagant appropriation will be asked for this purpose. I desire to make this single remark in furtherance of what the gentlemen from Texas have said. I must say I have felt a sense of being personally rebuked for my ignorance and inattention to one class of national interests when I saw in the city of New Orleans a line of shipping that I was informed by gentlemen competent to speak upon the subject far exceeded in amount the shipping ordinarily lying in the harbor of New York, not only home shipping but foreign shipping. Visiting as I did the mouth of the Mississippi, and seeing the enormous commerce that sweeps down that river and out into the Gulf, I felt that there had not been sufficient attention paid to the protection of that part of our coast.

I do not know that this particular island of Galveston is the place where the most protection is needed. But I resolved within myself that, whenever the opportunity was presented of turning the current of our national thoughts in the way of defense and of protection of that Gulf and coast, I would not again lose the opportunity of doing so. Without having any special knowledge whether this is the place where the fortification ought to be erected, I will only say that the motion to put a fortification anywhere on the waters of that Gulf, especially those waters looking toward the Mexican line, meets with my concurrence, provided the engineers of the Army say that such a work is needed and reasonable. The papers which have been read at the Clerk's desk seem to indicate that they have thus given their assent. I trust therefore that the point of order will not be pressed; but I hope also that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will reduce the amount proposed in his amendment, for perhaps a considerable smaller sum may be sufficient to begin the work.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say in regard to the point of order that a bill is now pending in the House to authorize this work, that bill has never passed, and as yet there is no law authorizing this work. This is, therefore, an appropriation not authorized by law. That is the ground upon which this point of order rests.

Mr. HALE. I am very desirous that this bill should be got out of the way because it is hindering the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who wishes to bring up another matter. But if no one else renews the point of order I would have no objection to allowing a vote to be taken on this amendment. But I must remind the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that when he seeks to put upon this bill this appropriation, which may be meritorious, he should reflect that this House last year adopted in regard to fortifications the sweeping rule that whatever might be the need or the menace there should be no money appropriated for any new works whatever; so that in pressing this amendment he is opposing the policy that was adopted last year and the policy which the Committee on Appropriations, acting on that basis, have adopted this year.

I have no objection to withdrawing the point of order so that, if no other gentlemen renews it, a vote shall be taken at once upon this proposition.

Mr. BANNING. But let the amount of the appropriation be reduced to $50,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] renews the point of order, then of course it is good.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas rise to discuss the point of order?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, I am not so familiar with the rules as the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from Maine. But amendments like this, looking to the public defense, the carrying on of the public service, and making an appropriation for a specific object, have been very common in the history of our legislation; nothing has been more common. I have not had my attention turned to the particular rule now in question, and therefore I am not able to say that there may not exist a rule which is conclusive upon this subject; but I rely upon the general history of our legislation as to appropriation bills to establish the fact that it has been common to insert in such bills provisions for maintaining the public defense and specifying what is not specified in any existing law, the particular portion of the public service for which the appropriation is made.

I trust very much that the gentleman from Indiana will consent to withdraw the point of order; and if he does I am prepared to accept an amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] conforming to the idea of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the amount of the appropriation, and which would also carry out the particular recommendations of the War Department in relation to the location of the fortifications at that place. Certainly this is a work of very great necessity; and to interpose an objection of possibly doubtful authority to prevent the appropriation for this necessary part of the public service, it seems to me, would operate somewhat harshly. We have the judgment of the War Department and also of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the necessity for this work. My colleague [Mr. HANCOCK] and I have stated some of the facts in regard to the necessity for this work of public defense; and surely an appropriation of $50,000 cannot be complained of unless the objection is that this proposed work is to be done in Texas and not somewhere on the Northern or Pacific coast.

Mr. BANNING. As the gentleman from Indiana makes his point of order for the purpose of saving money, I propose that the gentleman from Texas accept the following amendment, reducing the amount $50,000:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have erected suitable military fortifications for the defense of the commerce of the city of Galveston; and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be disposed of before any further proceedings can be had upon the amendment.

Mr. BANNING. I was going to say in regard to the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana makes the point for the purpose of saving money, and this amendment, which will save $50,000, will probably be satisfactory to him.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without withdrawing the point of order, I wish to answer the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] by saying that the action of the House at the last session accords with the provisions of this bill in applying the same rule to the northern coast that we apply to the southern. My friend from Texas cannot pretend to say that there is any discrimination in this respect. This is a new work not authorized by law. I insist that the rule, which is so valuable and important, shall be adhered to.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the point of order is not withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules out the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DURHAM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, and had directed the same to be reported without amendment and with a recommendation that it be passed.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. HALE called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 97) directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue a certificate of relocation for six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Missouri to the legal representatives of Samuel Ware; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 732) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine Thrush, and William B. Stone, owners of the schooner Flight;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2736) to remove the political disabilities of N. H. Van Zandt, of Virginia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 946) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina; and

A bill (S. No. 991) for the relief of Edwin Rogers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in resolutions in relation to the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams from the State of Massachusetts.

STATUES OF JOHN WINTHROP AND SAMUEL ADAMS.

Mr. HOAR. I now call up the special order fixed for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 19, 1876.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) 1. That the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams are accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress are given to the State of Massachusetts for these memorials of two of her eminent citizens whose names are indissolubly associated with the foundation of the Republic.

2. That a copy of these resolutions, engrossed upon parchment and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Massachusetts.

Attest:

GEO. C. GORHAM,
By W. J. MCDONALD,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in obedience to the invitation of Congress, presents to the United States the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams, to be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, and to be kept reverently in that beautiful and stately Chamber so long as its columns shall endure.

Different kinds of public service, various manifestations of intellectual and moral greatness, have been held by different nations and ages to constitute the chief title to their regard. With all her wealth in other departments of glory, England chiefly values the men who have done good fighting in her great wars. Marlborough and Nelson and Wellington crown the stateliest columns in the squares and streets of her chief cities. When we would picture to ourselves the republics of Italy, four laureled heads of famous poets stand out upon the canvass. The statue of Erasmus, the great scholar of Holland, with a book in his hand, looks down upon the busy market-place of Rotterdam. The judgment of mankind has probably determined that through the great jurists of the days of the empire Rome has made her deepest impression on the world. The names of great soldiers, founders of nations, jurists, ministers of state, men of science, inventors, historians, poets, orators, philanthropists, reformers, teachers, are found in turn on the columns by which the gratitude of nations seeks to give immortality to their benefactors.

In deciding which of these classes should be represented or who of her children in each is worthiest of this honor, Massachusetts has not been driven to choose of her poverty. Is the choice to fall upon a soldier? Sturdy Miles Standish, earliest of the famous captains of America—"in small room large heart inclosed"—Sir William Pepperell, the conqueror of Louisburg, may vie with each other for the glory of standing by the ever youthful and majestic figure of Warren.

Would the reverence of the nation commemorate its founders? To the State made up of the blended colonies founded by Endicott and Winthrop and the men who, on board the Mayflower, signed the first written constitution that ever existed among men, more than one-third of the people of the United States to-day trace their lineage.

No American state, no civilized nation, has contributed more illustrious names to jurisprudence than Parsons and Mason and Story and Shaw.

The long roll of her statesmen begins with those who laid the foundation of the little colony deep and strong enough for an empire. It will end when the love of liberty dies out from the soul of man. Bradford and Carver; Endicott and Winthrop; Vane, the friend of Milton and counselor of Cromwell; Otis and Samuel Adams and Quincy and Hawley, the men who conducted on the side of the people that great debate by which the Revolution was accomplished before the first gun was fired; John Adams and his son, whose biographies almost make up the history of the country for eighty years; Pickering, who filled in turn every seat in the cabinet; Webster, the greatest teacher of constitutional law, save Marshall; Andrew, the great war governor; Sumner, the echoes of whose voice seem yet audible in the Senate Chamber, by no means make up the whole of the familiar catalogue.

Science will not disdain to look for fitting representatives to the State of Bowditch and John Pickering and Wyman and Pierce, and which contains the birth-place of Franklin and the home and grave of Agassiz.

Are we to hold with Franklin that the world owes more to great inventors than to all its warriors and statesmen? The inventor of the cotton-gin, who doubled the value of every acre of cotton-producing land in the South; the inventor of the telegraph, at whose funeral obsequies the sorrow of all nations throbbing simultaneously around the globe was manifested; the discoverer of the uses of ether in surgery, who has disarmed sickness of half its pain and death of half its terrors, may dispute with each other a palm for which there will be no other competitors.

Among historians the names of Bancroft and Sparks and Motley and Prescott and Palfrey and Parkman will endure till the deeds they celebrate are forgotten. "Worthy deeds," said John Milton, "are not often destitute of worthy relators, as by a certain fate great acts and great eloquence have commonly gone hand in hand."

> Native to famous wits
> And hospitable, in her sweet recess,

Massachusetts contributes to the list of poets who have delighted the world the names of Bryant and Emerson and Whittier and Longfellow and Lowell and Holmes.

Among the foremost of Americans in oratory, that foremost of arts, stand Quincy, the Cicero of the Revolution; Otis, that "flame of fire;" the persuasive Choate, the silver-tongued Everett, the majestic Webster.

Of the great lovers of their race, whose pure fame is gained by unselfish devotion of their lives to lessening suffering or reforming vice, Massachusetts has furnished conspicuous examples. Among these great benefactors who have now gone to their reward, it is hard to determine the palm of excellence. To the labors of Horace Mann is due the excellence of the common schools in America, without which liberty must perish, despite of constitution or statute.

If an archangel should come down from heaven among men, I cannot conceive that he could give utterance to a loftier virtue or clothe his message in more fitting phrase than are found in the pure eloquence in which Channing arraigned slavery, that giant crime of all ages, before the bar of public opinion, and held up the selfish ambition of Napoleon to the condemnation of mankind. "Never before," says the eulogist of Channing, "in the name of humanity and freedom, was grand offender arraigned by such a voice. The sentence of degradation which Channing has passed, confirmed by coming generations, will darken the fame of the warrior more than any defeat of his arms, or compelled abdication of his power."

Dr. Howe, whose youthful service in the war for the independence of Greece, recalling the stories of knight-errantry, has endeared his name to two hemispheres, is yet better known by what he has done for those unfortunate classes of our fellow-men whom God has deprived of intellect or of sense. He gave eyes to the fingers of the blind, he taught the deaf and dumb articulate speech, waked the slumbering intellect in the darkened soul of the idiot, brought comfort, quiet, hope, courage, to the wretched cell of the insane.

To each of these the people of Massachusetts have in their own way, paid their tribute of honor and reverence. The statue of Horace Mann stands by the portal of the State House. The muse of Whittier and Holmes, the lips of our most distinguished living orators, the genius of his gifted wife, have united in a worthy memorial of Howe. The stately eloquence of Sumner, in his great oration at Cambridge, has built a monument to Channing more enduring than marble or granite, but Channing's published writings, eagerly read wherever the English language prevails, are better than any monument.

Yet I believe Channing and Howe and Mann, were they living to-day, would themselves yield precedence to the constant and courageous heroism of him who said, "I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard;" whose fame

> Over his living head, like heaven is bent
> An early and eternal monument.

The act of Congress limits the selection to deceased persons not exceeding two in number for each State. Massachusetts has chosen those who while they seemed the fittest representatives of what is peculiar in her own character and history have impressed that character on important public events which have been benefits to the nation at large.

That peculiarity is what is called Puritanism. To that principle, which I will try to define presently, I think it would not be difficult to trace nearly everything which Massachusetts has been able to achieve in any department of excellence. But it has a direct national importance in three conspicuous eras. One of them is too recent to allow of dispassionate consideration. The others are the eras of the foundation of the State and of the American Revolution.

Of the first, John Winthrop, twelve times governor of Massachusetts, from 1630 to 1649, is the best type. Of the second she has selected Samuel Adams, sometimes called "the last of the Puritans," as the representative.

"The true marshaling," says Lord Bacon, "of the degrees of sovereign honor are these: In the first place are conditores imperiorum, founders of states and commonwealths, such as were Romulus, Cyrus, Cæsar, Ottoman, Ismael." Whatever rank shall be assigned to our Commonwealth by history compared with the states of Romulus and Cyrus and the rest, the same "degree of sovereign honor" must be awarded to the man who founded it as compared with those named by Lord Bacon.

When you look upon the statue of John Winthrop you see the foremost man of that little company of Englishmen who abandoned wealth, comfort, rank, to found a Christian church and a republican State in the wilderness of New England. He was born in Suffolk on the 12th day of January, 1587. He was a gentleman of good estate and descent, and of wide and powerful family connection. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, bred to the bar, and had a considerable practice as an attorney of the court of wards and liveries. A large portion of his private papers and letters to his family and friends have been preserved. I know of no other man of his time of whose mental and spiritual life from his childhood up we have such full particulars. He was a man industrious, modest, wise, brave, generous, affectionate, a lover of home, of kindred, and friends, tolerant, religious, moderate, chaste, temperate, self-sacrificing. He had studied the laws of England, and thought deeply and clearly upon the principles of civil liberty. He was a member and communicant of the Church of England. From his early youth his letters to his family and near friends and numerous private manuscripts reveal his most secret religious meditations and aspirations. They breathe a sincere, liberal, catholic spirit of love to God and man, uttered in forms in which religious men of all denominations could unite. If these simple and eloquent utterances were found in a meditation of Pascal or A Kempis, in a confession of Saint Augustine, in a sermon of Jeremy Taylor, in a journal of John Wesley, or an essay of Channing, I do not think that any disciple of either would deem them out of place. His style is simple and serious, rising sometimes to a grave and majestic eloquence. There are passages in his letters of exquisite beauty and "in the loftiest strain of religious faith and devotional fervor." There was probably no man in England with tastes less inclined to the part of an adventurer, and with less personal ambition.

Such, in the year 1629, at the age of forty-three, was this model English gentleman, dwelling on his own landed estate, surrounded by affluence, engaged in honorable public employments, happy in home, friends, honor. He had heard of a rocky and ice-bound region, the gloom of whose eternal forests was tenanted by savage beasts and men more savage. He had heard of a little company of Englishmen, who had landed on that coast ten years before, at mid-winter, half of whom had perished before spring, "at one time only six or seven having strength enough left to nurse the dying and bury the dead," and who for ten years had maintained a precarious and doubtful struggle with famine and pestilence and the rigorous climate. But what should drive him, of all mankind, to leave the delights of rich and luxurious England, to abandon the pleasant vales of Suffolk, for the rocks and sands of Massachusetts? "Founders of states, such as were Romulus, Cyrus, Cæsar, Ottoman, Ismael." A founder of states such as these were not was John Winthrop. No legions flushed with foreign conquest demanded that he should lead them across the Rubicon to found an empire on the ruins of his country. No milk of the she-wolf mingling with the streams of his blood made him the fit founder of an asylum for a clan of banditti. No fanatical passion for conquest, no dream of sensual paradise, no restless nomadic habit, disturbed the even tenor of his life. But he was one of those men to whose happiness civil and religious liberty were absolutely essential. The third Parliament of Charles I had just been dissolved. England was entering upon a period of ten years of absolute monarchy, her civil and military administration in the hands of Strafford, her spiritual affairs in the hands of Laud. Winthrop agreed in opinion with those who were disposed to submit to neither.

A charter had been earlier obtained. A few colonists had gone over to New England and established a government in subordination to the company in England. On the 26th day of August, 1629, Winthrop and eleven others signed an agreement at Cambridge "to embark for the said plantation, to the end to pass the seas (under God's protection) to inhabit and continue in New England; provided always, that the whole government, together with the patent for the said plantation, be first by an order of court legally transferred and established to remain with us and others which shall inhabit upon the said plantation." This condition was performed. In October thereafter the record of the company recites "the court having received extraordinary great commendations of Mr. John Winthrop, both for his integrity and sufficiency, as being one every way well fitted and accomplished for the place, the said Mr. Winthrop was with a general vote chosen to be governor for the ensuing year."

It is more than probable that the accession of Winthrop to their society was the condition of the whole emigration. It is more than probable that the coming over of Winthrop and his fleet of ships saved the whole Puritan settlement from being abandoned. It is certain that for the nineteen years for which he was chief director of the affairs of the colony he impressed upon it his own character and qualities. He took farewell of England "in a flood of tears." He begged his brethren of the English church for their prayers, "which will be a most prosperous gale in our sails." To narrate his remaining life would be only to tell again the well-known tale of the history of Massachusetts for its first nineteen years.

The qualities which the greatest rulers of free States have displayed in the most difficult times were all needed in the governor of the infant Commonwealth. No other American so nearly resembles Washington. "He was, indeed," says the old annalist, "a governor who had most exactly studied that book, which, pretending to teach politics, did only contain three leaves, and but one word on each of those leaves, which word was 'moderation.'" Another Puritan writer calls him "that famous pattern of piety and justice." He was reproved by the clergy of the colony for his "overmuch lenity," in the month Roger Williams was banished. He preserved unbroken his friendship with Williams, who wished him to be the governor of his own plantation in Rhode Island. He poured out his estate in charity, leaving but £100 at his death. He gave his last measure of meal to a poor woman, when the colony was starving, a ship laden with provisions from England arriving just in time for their safety.

When impeached for an act of necessary authority, he took his place modestly and meekly at the bar of the court of which he had been head, where he defended himself in a discourse defining the true nature of civil liberty which for grave and majestic eloquence has been pronounced by high authority "equal to anything of antiquity."

The questions which divided the Roundhead from the Cavalier, the Puritan from the high churchman, are not yet at rest. Until they are, men will differ in their estimate of the generation to which John Winthrop belonged and of the Commonwealth of which he was the chief founder. But the concurrent judgment of all lovers of America now accepts the estimate which has been eloquently expressed by his distinguished biographer and descendant, your accomplished predecessor in that chair: "A great example of private virtue and public usefulness; of moderation in counsel and energy in action; of stern self-denial and unsparing self-devotion; of child-like trust in God and implicit faith in the gospel of Christ, united with courage enough for conducting a colony across the ocean and wisdom enough for building up a state in the wilderness."

When John Winthrop died, in 1649, the colony of which he had been the foremost planter was firmly established as a Christian state. Thirty flourishing towns, in which every freeman had an equal vote, were represented in the Legislature. The college, the schools, the churches, agriculture, and trade and fisheries were prospering. The little Commonwealth did its full share to keep up the glory of the English flag at Louisburg, at Quebec, at Martinique, and the Havanna, and many another well-fought field. But the people kept a wary lookout for any encroachment by King, Parliament, or governor on the natural and inalienable rights of Englishmen, as declared by their charter. In 1763 the great drama was fairly opened which ended with the separation from England and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The Legislature hesitated a good while whether Samuel Adams, or his illustrious kinsman, John Adams, should be chosen as the representative of the revolutionary age. I think the even-hanging balance was inclined at last by the thought of the ample compensations which life brought to the latter for his services and sacrifices in his country's cause.

I can conceive of nothing which the human heart can desire in satisfaction of a pure ambition which did not fall to the lot of John Adams. As was well said by Mr. Webster, "he was attended through life by a great and fortunate genius. He had written his name where all nations should behold it, and where all time should not efface it." He lived to see the independence of his country achieved. His was the rare good fortune to take part in a great revolution from its beginning to its successful issue. The proscribed rebel was received by the sovereign who had hated him as the representative of a great and free people. He was deemed by his countrymen worthy to be associated with Washington in the inauguration of the Government, and succeeded him in the great office of the Presidency. He was the foremost champion of the Declaration of Independence on the floor of Congress, and his famous prophecy will cause his name to be remembered by his countrymen as its anniversary returns until time shall be no more. He was the chief author of the constitution of his native State. He rejoiced in the congenial companionship of one of the most affectionate of wives and most intellectual of women. His life ended on the spot where it began, at the great age of ninety, in a strong, vigorous old age, made happy by private affection and public reverence. By a coincidence almost miraculous, his death took place when millions of his countrymen, happy and at peace, under the Presidency of his son, were celebrating the great day he had made famous. "If the chariot and horses of fire had been vouchsafed to him, he could scarcely have had a more splendid translation or departed in a brighter blaze of glory."

Samuel Adams, on the other hand, lived and died poor. His only son preceded him to the grave, leaving none to inherit his name. He held no considerable public office, except that of delegate to the Continental Congress, until he succeeded Hancock as governor in his seventy-second year, when in his own opinion the weight of years and infirmities was beginning to unfit him for further service.

But for more than thirty years, beginning when most of the great actors in the Revolution were unborn or were children, he was the unquestioned leader of the contest for liberty in Massachusetts. I shall not repeat the familiar story. Samuel Adams was, I think, the greatest of our American public men in civil life; greatest, if we judge him by the soundness and sureness of his opinions on the great questions of his time and of all time; greatest, as shown by the strength of original argument by which he persuaded the people to its good; greatest in the imperial power of personal will by which he inspired and compelled and subdued the statesmen of his day who were his companions; greatest in the sublime self-denial which contented itself with accomplishing public results without seeking personal reward either of fame or office.

"If there was any Palinurus to the Revolution," said Thomas Jefferson, "Samuel Adams was that man." From the day when on taking his degree at Harvard in 1743 he maintained that it is lawful to resist the supreme magistrate if the commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved, down to the time when the Declaration severed the tie between England and the colonies, he conducted the great debate of liberty. In the achievement of great revolutions which mark and secure the progress of liberty, three kinds of leaders are alike indispensable: the philosopher, who establishes great principles; the statesman, who frames great measures, fills great executive offices, leads popular and legislative assemblies; the politician, without whose marshaling of political forces civil contests must be carried on by mobs, and not by parties. Adams was all three. With clear logic he derived his great argument from its foundations in the immmutable laws of ethics and the inalienable rights of human nature. With consummate wisdom, he directed all the measures of the Massachusetts Assembly, never driven from his position or taking a false step. He was the most dextrous politician that ever planned an election or managed a caucus. He laid down the pen in the midst of a profound treatise which Locke or Hooker might have envied to mingle with the workmen at the rope-walk or the crowd at the street corner to plan the conduct of the coming town-meeting. I know no second instance in history where these three characters have been so wonderfully combined. Yet, what is more wonderful still, Adams was free from the faults which commonly beset each. A profound political philosopher, his feet always touched the ground. He was never led astray by his theory. A statesman, he was without personal ambition. A politician, he was without a wile. There is no more hurtful error than the notion of our doctrinaires that the function performed in free states by men who are termed politicians is not dignified, honorable, serviceable, and honest. When wars are brought to successful issue without planning the campaigns; when battles are won without generals, disposition of forces, or discipline, good results will come to pass under popular governments without politicians. But whether concerting his plans in the caucus or addressing the people in Faneuil Hall, which was called his "throne," the absolute truth and simple honesty of Samuel Adams were unstained. He would not have deceived that people if thereby he could have redeemed a world from bondage.

With unerring wisdom, earlier than any other person in his own State, he saw the principles on which the American cause was based, and the means by which public opinion should be convinced, combined, and made effective in their support. He saw the power of the newspaper when it was almost unused as a political force. He was the author of the most important state papers, the instructions of the town of Boston to its representatives, of the assembly to its agents in England, its answers to the royal governors, wherein the natural rights of men, the chartered privileges of the people, and the limits of executive and legislative power were established on foundations from which they have never been removed. It was said of him that he had the eyes of Argus and as many hands as Briareus, and in each hand a pen. His style was simple, severe, chaste, restrained, as became the great themes he had to discuss. But it conveyed his weighty meaning alike to the understanding of the people and the apprehension of his antagonists. "Every dip of his pen," said Bernard, "stung like a horned snake."

He always put other men forward when glory was to be gained or desirable public office to be filled—never when responsibility or peril was to be encountered. Behind the conspicuous presence of Hancock, the brilliant rhetoric of Otis, the British governors felt and dreaded the iron hand of Adams. With his own lips he gave the signal for the movement of the tea party. With his own hand he carried to the council the impeachment of Oliver. On the day of the Boston massacre Adams intrusted no other messenger with the demand for the removal of the regiments. Yonder statue represents the great popular leader and chieftain, king of men, the genius of American liberty speaking through his lips, as he stood in the presence of the royalty of England represented by Governor Hutchinson: "If you have the power to remove one regiment you have power to remove both. It is at your peril if you refuse; night is approaching; an immediate answer is expected. Both regiments or none." "It was then," said Adams afterward, "if fancy deceived me not, that I observed his knees to tremble. I thought I saw his face grow pale, and I enjoyed the sight."

He was among the earliest of American advocates, I think in nearly every case the earliest, of doctrines which, when he first uttered them, were deemed paradoxes or utopian dreams, but to-day are the accepted maxims of constitutional liberty. Among these he maintained that the right to life, liberty, and property are essential and inalienable rights of human nature;

That Magna Charta is irrepealable by Parliament, (citing in support of this view the curse pronounced by the church in presence of King Henry III and the estates of the realm upon all who should make statutes or observe them contrary to it;)

That representation of America in Parliament was impossible;

That King or Parliament, together or separately, had no right to affect the liberties of the colonies;

That, therefore, Parliament had no power to legislate for the colonies in any case;

That the union of the several powers of government in one person is dangerous to liberty;

That the Crown had no right to grant salaries to colonial judges or governors;

That kings and governors may be guilty of treason and rebellion, and have in general been more guilty of them than their subjects;

That the welfare and safety of the people are paramount to all other law;

That governments are founded on equal rights;

That the people have natural right to change a bad constitution whenever it is in their power;

That American manufactures should be a constant theme

He was never weary,

Says his biographer—

of promoting a widely diffused common school system, whereby the poorest might educate his children to a point where talent might win its way on equal terms with their more wealthy neighbors. This was democratic doctrine in its purest form and, as Mr. Adams conceived it, was the principle on which the Revolution had been accomplished.

The instinct of Hutchinson did not err when it pronounced him the first man in America who advocated independence.

The first public denial of the right of Parliament to tax America, the first public opposition to the stamp-act, the first suggestion of a general union of the colonies, are in the instruction of the town of Boston to its representatives, adopted in 1764 and drafted by Samuel Adams. This preceded by twelve months Patrick Henry's resolution in the Virginia House of Burgesses of May, 1765. In that life of incessant activity, constantly engaged in debate in the assembly, in controversy in the press, a writer of such originality that the doctrines must have seemed to the men of his day paradoxes, having to meet a powerful and unscrupulous government by combining popular forces, no instance can be found of his advancing a doctrine which is not to-day accepted, or of his proposing a measure from which he was compelled to recede.

It has been charged that the "glittering generalities" of the Declaration of Independence were the result of the French tastes of Jefferson, and were acquiesced in—not believed in—by his associates in the Continental Congress to conciliate his supposed influence in Virginia. The criticism has been made by Mazzini, I think repeated by Bismarck, that it asserts that the security of rights, not the performance of duties, is the object of the state. The statement and the criticism are unlike unfounded. Every sentiment of the Declaration can be found anticipated in the writings of Samuel Adams. It contains the matured opinions of the most religious race of men that ever lived at the most religious period of their history. The men who believed that "the chief end of man is to glorify God and enjoy him forever" did not lightly put on record their creed as to the object of the state and the purpose for which governments are instituted among men. They knew that to add a political sanction to religious or moral duty, or to enlist the forces of the state for its performance is impossible without trenching upon that liberty of conscience, which they valued even more than their political rights.

Burke, in his famous delineation of the character of the colonists in his great speech on conciliation with America mentions as among the marvels of history the formation of voluntary government by the people when the ancient government of Massachusetts was abrogated by Great Britain. That voluntary government, obeyed, as Lord Dunmore said of that in Virginia, "infinitely better than the ancient ever was in its most fortunate periods," was largely the work of Samuel Adams.

His respect for law and horror of lawless violence were remarkable in the leader of a revolution. When the mob attacked the house of Hutchinson he declared he would rather have lost his right hand. It was through his influence that Quincy and John Adams defended Captain Preston, and the soldiers who had fired on the people and secured their acquittal. He restrained the impatience of the people, waiting patiently for eight years till the time should come when his opponents should be put clearly in the wrong by first resorting to force.

He had a marvelous personal magnetism which few men could resist, by which he attracted many brilliant and able men to the cause of his country. John Adams declares in his diary that "to my certain knowledge from 1758 to 1775, that is, for seventeen years, he made it his constant rule to watch the rise of every brilliant genius, to seek his acquaintance, to court his friendship, to cultivate his natural feelings in favor of his native country, to warn him against the hostile designs of Great Britain." He gives us a few names out of many thus brought to the cause of America, Hancock, Warren, and Quincy. To these names he might have added his own, as abundant passages in his diary bear witness.

Samuel Adams seems to have been a man without a selfish personal desire. You cannot trace in him the slightest evidence of the passions that so commonly beset the path of men in public life. The love of fame, the love of money, the love of pleasure, the love of ease, the love of power, the love of office, were alike without influence on that heart in which the love of liberty burned with a perpetual flame. The authorship of many of his ablest papers remained unknown till long after he died. The agents of the King more than once tried to tempt him with money or office. Most of his companions in the public service found means to gain competent fortunes by their own industry. Adams once declared that a guinea never glistened in his eyes. But for a small inheritance received late in life from his son, he must have been supported in his old age by charity and buried at the public charge. His only relaxation from his unrepaid public cares was in conversation, especially with little children, of whose society he was passionately fond, and sometimes in listening to or joining in sacred music, in which he especially delighted.

The judgment of historians, the voice of the people, the praises of friends, the anger of enemies, bear concurrent witness to the great qualities of Samuel Adams.

Bancroft calls him "the chief of the Revolution." He says "his vigorous, manly will resembled in its tenacity well-tempered steel which may ply a little but will not break."

Sir James Grahame says "Samuel Adams was one of the most perfect models of disinterested patriotism, and of republican genius and character, that any age or country has produced."

Jefferson called him "the Palinurus of the Revolution." He declared "he was truly a great man, wise in counsel, fertile in his resources, immovable in his purposes, and had, I think, a greater share than any other member in advising and directing our measures in the northern war. I always considered him more than any other man the fountain of our important measures."

Patrick Henry writes from Williamsburgh, when Virginia was about to frame her constitution, "Would to God you and your Samuel Adams were here."

James Warren said he was "the man who had the greatest hand in the greatest revolution in the world."

John Adams exhausts the language of eulogy in his praise: "He has the most thorough understanding of liberty and her resources in the temper and character of the people. He was born and tempered a wedge of steel."

Stephen Sayre calls him "the Father of America."

Josiah Quincy says "many in England esteem him the first politician in the world."

A distinguished clergyman of his time calls him "one of Plutarch's men."

Hutchinson, the tory governor, calls him "the all in all," "the great incendiary leader of Boston." When the ministry wrote to Hutchinson "Why has not Mr. Adams been taken off from his opposition by an office?" he replied, "Such is the obstinacy and inflexible disposition of the man that he never would be conciliated by any office or gift whatever." When Hutchinson went back to England he was received to an audience by King George in his closet, where king and governor vied with each other in denunciation of Sam. Adams.

Galloway, the Philadelphia tory, declared in his examination before the House of Commons that "the lower ranks in Philadelphia were governed in a great degree by Mr. Adams."

Gage, in June, 1775, excepts from the general offer of pardon "Samuel Adams and John Hancock, whose offenses are of too flagitious a nature to admit of any other consideration than that of condign punishment."

And so, Mr. Speaker, it has come to pass that in the centennial year, Massachusetts brings the first and the last of her great Puritans to represent her in the nation's gallery of heroes and patriots. Two hundred and forty-six years have gone by since John Winthrop landed at Salem. It is a hundred years since Samuel Adams set his name at Philadelphia to the charter of that independence which it had been the great purpose of his life to accomplish. Their characters, public and private, have been the subject of an intense historic scrutiny, both hostile and friendly. But the State, not, we hope, having failed to learn whatever new lessons these centuries have brought, still adopts them as the best she has to offer.

I do not use the word Puritan in a restricted sense. I do not mean the bigots or zealots who were the caricature of their generation. I do not discuss the place in history of the men of the English commonwealth. Whether the hypocritical buffoon of Hudibras or the religious enthusiast of Macaulay be the fit type of that generation of Englishmen before whom Europe trembled, we do not need to inquire. I use the word in a large sense, as comprehending the men who led the emigration, made up the bulk of the numbers, established the institutions of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Plymouth, and administered their affairs as self-governing republics in all but name for more than a century and a half.

Through the vast spaces of human history there have resounded but a few heroic strains. Unless the judgment of those writers who have best conceived and pictured heroism—Milton, Burke, Carlyle, Froude—be at fault, among these there has been none loftier than the Puritanism of New England. The impress which a man makes upon mankind depends upon what he believes, what he loves, what are his qualities of intellect and of temper. You must consider all these to form a just estimate of the great generations with which we are dealing. The Puritan loved liberty, religious and civil; he loved home and family and friends and country with a love never surpassed, and he loved God. He did not love pleasure or luxury or mirth. He dwelt with the delight of absolute certainty on the anticipation of a life beyond the grave. His intellect was fit for exact ethical discussion, clear in seeing general truths, active, unresting, fond of inquiry and debate, but penetrated and restrained by a shrewd common sense. He saw with absolute clearness the true boundary which separates liberty and authority in the state. He had a genius for making constitutions and statutes. He had a tenacity of purpose, a lofty and inflexible courage, an unbending will, which never quailed or flinched before human antagonist, or before exile, torture, or death. The Puritan was a thorough gentleman, of dignified, noble, stately bearing, as becomes men who bear weighty responsibilities, deal with the greatest interests, and meditate on the loftiest themes. Read John Winthrop's definition of civil liberty or his reasons for settling in New England and judge of the temper of those men, who, of free choice, made him twelve times their governor.

The Puritan believed that the law of God is the rule of life for states as for men. He believed in the independence of the individual conscience and in self-government according to the precedents of English liberty, because he believed that both were according to the will of God. "It is the glory of the British constitution," said Samuel Adams, "that it hath its foundation in the law of God." "The magistrate is the servant," said John Adams, "not of his own desires, not even of the people, but of his God." He derived the knowledge of that will from a literal interpretation of Scripture, which he thought furnished precepts or examples for every occasion. Yet it is wonderful how soon the common sense of the Puritan wrought out the principles of sound administration, and freed him from the errors into which other men fell. He interpreted literally the divine command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." Yet the witchcraft delusion, disgrace of all Christian nations, never reached Plymouth or Connecticut, and touched Massachusetts but lightly. In England, from 1600 to 1680, 40,000 persons were put to death as witches, and in Scotland nearly as many. On the continent of Europe the victims were numbered by hundreds of thousands. In Massachusetts the number never reached a score. The little Swiss city of Geneva put to death five hundred persons for this crime in a single year. A child of nine years old was executed for witchcraft in Huntingdon, England, in 1719. The laws against witchcraft remained in force in England till 1736, and in Scotland till 1738, fifty years after the time when, first of all mankind, Massachusetts repented of the delusion, the opinion of her whole people being uttered in the ever memorable confession of Sewall, the Puritan chief justice. They had sacrificed almost every thing else that man values to enjoy the worship of God after their own fashion. Yet they were among the first of mankind to establish complete religious toleration. I have heard the Puritans of New England taunted for religious bigotry by the representatives of States who, as late as 1741, put men to death for the crime of being Catholics.

The Puritan believed in a future life, where just men were to enjoy immortality with those whom they had loved here; and this belief was his comfort and support in all the sorrow and suffering which he encountered. But he believed also in the coming of God's kingdom here. He had a firm faith that the state he had builded was to continue and grow, a community of men living together in the practice of virtue, in the worship of God, in the pursuit of truth. It has been said of each of two great Puritan leaders, "Hope shone like a fiery pillar in him when it had gone out in all others. His mind is firmly fixed on the future; his face is radiant with the sunrise he intently watches."

Lastly, the Puritan believed in the law of righteous retribution in the affairs of nations. No departure from God's law of absolute justice, of absolute honesty, of absolute righteousness, could escape, so it seemed to him, its certain and terrible punishment. The oppressor who deprived the poorest or weakest of mankind of the equal right with which God had endowed him, the promise-breaker, who juggled with public obligation, the man who gained power by violence or fraud, brought down, as he believed, the vengeance of God upon himself and upon his children, and upon the nation which permitted him, to the third and fourth generation.

Mr. Speaker, the State that the Puritan planted has opened her gates to men of other lineage and of other creed. It may be that in the coming centuries his descendants are to yield to another race the dominion of his beloved New England and that only in gentler climes and on the shores of a more pacific sea men will delight to remember that their fathers were of the company of Winthrop or sat in council with Adams. But the title of the Puritan to remembrance will not depend upon locality. In that mightier national life, drawn from so many sources—of many, one; of many States, one nation; of many races, one people; of many creeds, one faith—the elements he has contributed are elements of perpetual power: his courage; his constancy; his belief in God; his reverence for law; his love of liberty; his serene and lofty hope. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Massachusetts presents to the United States the statues of two of her representative men. She has selected for her heroes no brilliant but erratic genius, general, orator, or poet, for a time the wonder of mankind, but two men, each of whom owes his fame to the unselfish devotion of a life-time to the cause in which his youth embarked. Not that they were either of them common men. Both were born leaders. They were men of unusual firmness and persistency; both men who scorned to be turned aside from the work to which they had dedicated their lives by any thought of personal gain or office or honor. But their right to leadership was built upon the fact that in themselves they embodied and illustrated the most powerful moving sentiments of the time in which they each of them lived.

We must leave out of view, when we would ascertain what at a given epoch is the most powerful influence that is operating to shape or transform the political or religious life of a country, all that large class, the majority in fact of its people, who give no time to thought and readily subscribe to whatever dogmas in politics or religion may be current, so long as the trade in silks or woolens, in corn or cotton, is active and remunerative. Such are not the men whose acts and whose will overturn empires, reform religions, and lead mankind in new paths of progress. Such are not the men who are troubled about the shortcomings of the dominant church, or who tremble at the first insidious attacks made by power upon liberty. But we, who are of English stock, may make it our boast that in each succeeding age a large body of the people, in all classes in society, have acknowledged the duty they owed to the church and to the State, to keep the first pure and the second true to the great charter of our liberties.

The leaders of thought and afterward in action must clearly perceive the danger to be overcome, whether it arises from the perversity of those intrusted with power or the indifference of the people; must devise the remedy and combine and marshal the forces necessary to uproot the prevailing wrong, and create or renew correct opinions and practices in religion or politics.

We need not be reminded that from the time when John Winthrop attained his manhood down to the day of his death one strong purpose animated and controlled the serious and solid men of England. I do full justice to the manly and chivalrous devotion of the cavaliers to the throne, to the zeal and love of the churchmen for the established religion. But the men who beheaded a Strafford, who overthrew a Land, who conquered a monarch and established two commonwealths, one at home, ill-conditioned and short-lived, the other, esto perpetua, on these shores, were the men who impressed themselves on their age and have left their impress upon all future generations. They were the men who saw and believed that their liberties, civil and religious, were in danger; who knew no duty but in attempting to recover their rights. In the mind and character of some the religious element predominated; in others, the determination to recover the ancient rights and privileges of the British subject was the ruling motive. But among all who were active on the side of the people in the stirring events of that time both motives combined.

I know how unsafe it is to generalize on any historical subject. What is gained in point and effect is lost in accuracy. But it is not too much to assert that the revolution against the kingly power owed its commencement to those who, while sufficiently religious, yet felt most keenly the wrong done by the king to the civil and political rights of the subject; while on the other hand the founding of the Massachusetts Commonwealth was due to those who, not unmindful of the danger to political liberty, were impelled primarily by their belief that their foremost duty was to bring their lives into absolute subjection to the will of God. The latter subordinated their duty to the state, yes, and the state itself, to what they conceived to be the law of God. The former had, from education, from family, and from tradition, that almost superstitious veneration for what was termed the constitutional rights of Englishmen which made them start at any infraction of the provisions of that constitution and eventually take arms in defense of its integrity. And it is a singular fact that when the revolution against the power of the King, commenced by the friends of civil liberty, was well-nigh failing, it owed its revival and ultimate success to the strength that was imparted to it by those whose ruling motive was the religious one. For it was Cromwell and Ireton and the men who prepared for the fight by prayer who proved invincible to all the dash and impetuosity of Rupert and his squadrons. On the other hand—I trust it is not a fanciful comparison—our colony founded by John Winthrop, and for over a century sustained by the influence of him and men like him, who would use the state itself only as a means to glorify God and make all men keep his commandments, never reached its full stature as a perfect commonwealth until new encroachments upon political rights caused the descendants of the Puritans to turn their whole attention to the preservation of their liberties. Then, as John Winthrop, the representative man of his day, was chosen by his peculiar fitness to lead a devoted band to build up the church in the wilderness, so Samuel Adams, equally the representative of the men of his time, was at once recognized as the one man fitted to lead in the work of the new revolution against royal aggression.

It derogates nothing from the merit of Winthrop or Adams that each was the product of the time in which he lived. It rather heightens their claim to the gratitude and reverent regard of their contemporaries and of posterity that they possessed the clearness of vision to understand and the forgetfulness of self and firmness of purpose to carry into execution the best if not the only measures which would secure in the earlier time the religious independence and in the later period the civil and political freedom which of right belonged to all free-born Englishmen.

As in the mother-country the love of freedom needed the aid of religious zeal before it could succeed in its struggle against power, so on the other hand in New England its religious zeal and constancy needed the liberalizing aid of the spirit of democracy in order that full freedom of conscience in things religious might be guaranteed to all men. And so Massachusetts regards herself to-day as built upon the two foundations of religion and of liberty. In her belief one cannot exist apart from the other. Religion is the main reliance to prevent liberty from degenerating into license. A devotion to liberty and the equal rights of all will alone guarantee that toleration without which religion itself becomes either a matter of form or an engine of oppression.

It is most fitting, then, that Massachusetts should present to the United States the statues of Winthrop and of Samuel Adams. The one is the true type of the religious element; the other, the full embodiment of the spirit of liberty; both together represent the Commonwealth itself, the perfect result of the full blending of religion and liberty, working in harmony in the cause of human progress.

It is not for me to present to you an analysis of the characteristics of the Puritans or to show in what manner and by the possession of what qualities they have exerted so great an influence upon the fortunes of our country. If I desired I could add nothing to the completeness of the picture drawn by my colleague who has preceded me. I should only mar the beauty and symmetry of his portraiture were I to add so much as a single touch. Let me rather say that whatever may have been the rivalries between Puritans and Pilgrims or between the early settlers of the New England and those of more southern colonies, the differences between them bear no comparison to the points of similarity. Wherever we turn in the history of Massachusetts or Virginia, we shall find all through its pages the evidence that the people of both States descended from a common stock, that both made it their chief boast that the ancient rights and privileges of Englishmen were theirs; that when freedom was assailed both sprang with equal alacrity to its defense; that, when both had shaken off the shackles of colonial dependence and came to adopt a declaration of rights and a frame of government suited to a free people, the constitutions of Massachusetts and of Virginia differed in no essential particular; and that in the task of establishing the Federal Union for the common defense against foreign enemies and the common security against domestic violence, while at the same time the States and the people were guaranteed the rights essential to the preservation of liberty, Samuel Adams of Massachusetts and Thomas Jefferson of Virginia found themselves in perfect accord.

In the next place I do not dwell upon the contrasts that may be discovered between the colonists of 1630 and the revolutionists of 1775. There was never a time when religious zeal was powerful enough in the colony to cause the people or the magistrates to lose sight of the great bulwarks of civil freedom. The principles and forms of the common law were constantly followed. The Parliament was supported in its contest with the King. And from first to last there was manifested a firm determination to insist on all the rights and the substantial independence conferred by the original charter of the company.

On the other hand, at the time of the Revolution and long after, the power and the influence of the clergy were felt in state as well as church, and the habit of referring to the words of Scripture as authority in things temporal as well as in things spiritual was almost universal. For two centuries at least after the first settlement of Boston, the building up of the church and the preservation of their liberties were the prime motives that inspired the conduct of the men of Massachusetts. At one time one motive predominated, at another the other, but both were always active.

I have said that these men owe their fame not to any single brilliant exploit. It is on the other hand only by the well-rounded work of a life-time that they so truly represent two centuries of Massachusetts history. But not only because they best illustrate the times in which they live, but also because they most clearly foresaw what was needed in the future of their country, it is proper that their statues should have an honorable place among those contributed to our National Gallery. In these days when office is without honor, when the possession of wealth is almost of itself a ground of suspicion against its possessor, and when culture instead of conferring strength is too often only a badge of inefficiency, one can but be struck by the contrast which the first and second centuries of our history present to the present time.

In John Winthrop were united social station, official rank, refined culture, and, until late in life, a sufficient fortune. Adams was undoubtedly a man most democratic in his tendencies; yet in his day due respect was rendered to the magistrates; honor to the man of learning, and wealth was esteemed as the fair reward of honest and patient endeavor. In these respects Winthrop and Adams but reflect the habit of their own times. But a public man's influence upon posterity depends upon what he has thought out and wisely said in the way of solving the political, religious, or social problems, with which the future must deal.

In Winthrop's time it was hoped and believed that the colonial charter contained a sufficient guarantee for the substantial independence of the colony. It was not then deemed either desirable or practicable to bring about a complete separation from the mother country; yet every step taken by Winthrop and his contemporaries was preparatory to the actual and complete independence which was to follow. Before his death Winthrop witnessed the entire success of his enterprise, and he had been mainly instrumental in giving such a foundation and such a direction to the public sentiment of the people as would keep the rising state always in the path which he had marked out for it when he determined on removing to the New World.

Adams, when he came upon the stage, had another century of the experience of England and the colony on which to draw for instruction. He could also learn from the development of the country and from its constant disputes with the home government what its future must be and what the basis on which government here must rest.

His views were always singularly clear, and those of his earlier years required little modification even in his old age. Hear him at the age of twenty-six, discussing what is true loyalty:

> The true object of loyalty is a good, legal constitution, which, as it condemns every instance of oppression and lawless power, derives a certain remedy to the sufferer by allowing him to remonstrate his grievances, and pointing out methods of relief when the gentle arts of persuasion have lost their efficacy. Whoever, therefore, insinuates notions of government contrary to the Constitution, or in any degree winks at any measure to suppress or even to weaken it, is not a loyal man. Whoever acquaints us that we have no right to examine into the conduct of those who, though they derive their power from us to serve the common interests, make use of it to impoverish and ruin us, is in a degree a rebel—to the undoubted rights and liberties of the people.

This was in 1748. Twenty years later, when troops were stationed in Boston and their removal was demanded by the citizens, Adams thus wrote to the Boston Gazette:

> Where military power is introduced, military maxims are propagated and adopted which are inconsistent with, and must soon eradicate, every idea of civil government. Do we not already find some persons weak enough to believe that an officer is obliged to obey the order of his superior though it oe even against the law? And let any one consider whether this doctrine does not directly lead even to the setting up of that officer, whoever he may be, as a tyrant?

I may not go on with quotations.

For over a quarter of a century after this he continued in public life, and so long he continued to repeat and enforce his arguments in favor of a constitutional government, based upon universal liberty and secured by the safeguards of religion and popular education.

So Massachusetts, in presenting their statues, presents herself again to the United States. She claims for her people that, recognizing the merits of these two men, she recognizes the truths for the sake of which they spent their lives, and she promises for herself that she will not fail in religiously performing every constitutional duty. Whenever an attempt shall be made to subvert our institutions, whether by the reckless employment of force or by a resort to the subtler method of deception and fraud practiced on the people, Massachusetts must forget her traditions and her memories if she fails to be first in the field to resist all illegal conduct and protect the rights of her citizens.

She has placed these statues on either side of the entrance to that Hall where in a later day another Adams fell at his post of duty, so that we, who in these busy and perhaps most critical times are sent here to do what in us lies to preserve and transmit unimpaired that constitutional liberty which is an inheritance, must in going out from this Hall after our daily service pass between the silent forms of Winthrop and of Adams.

Whatever son of Massachusetts can leave this Hall with the consciousness that in act or vote or speech he has been true to the ancient renown of his State, has resisted every attempt to subvert the principles on which the permanence of our liberties depends, has religiously held his allegiance to truth and firmly opposed all falsehood and fraud and trickery, has not forgotten his country in his zeal for party nor forfeited his self-respect and the respect of good men by his desire for office and personal gain, finally who has imitated the life and conduct of these two men whose example we offer to the imitation of all lovers of free government, may hold his head erect, and look full in the face those almost speaking statues, and feel as if a blessing were resting upon his pathway.

But if at any time any recreant son of the old Commonwealth should dare to use his position here to undermine the institutions of his country, to stifle the voice of a free people through the instrumentality of fraud or force, or both combined, should use his office for personal gain or to secure a party triumph at the sacrifice of truth and of justice, then I fancy I see that man, as he passes out of yonder portal, crouching between the stately images at which he dares not look, and as it expecting the marble lips to part and utter the curse which he so well would merit. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, up to this day, as the virtues and merits of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams have never been unrecognized, so in each generation since his death some descendant of Winthrop and for four generations some kinsman of Adams has filled an honorable place in the service of the State. Far distant be the day when any future generation in the old Commonwealth shall be deprived of the service of a Winthrop or an Adams. Far distant be the day when there shall be wanting many, many descendants of the early Puritans who will be prompt to do honor to the memory and imitate the unselfish devotion to duty of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams. [Applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that illness has made it impossible for me to keep the promise which I made a few days since to offer some reflections appropriate to this very interesting occasion. But I cannot let the moment pass without expressing my great satisfaction with the fitting and instructive choice which the State of Massachusetts has made, and the manner in which her Representatives have discharged their duty in presenting these beautiful works of art to the Congress of the nation.

As, from time to time, our venerable and beautiful Hall has been peopled with statues of the elect of the States, it has seemed to me that a third house was being organized within the walls of the Capitol—a house whose members have received their high credentials at the hands of history, and whose term of office will outlast the ages. Year by year, we see the circle of its immortal membership enlarging; year by year, we see the elect of their country, in eloquent silence, taking their places in this American Pantheon, bringing within its sacred circle the wealth of those immortal memories which made their lives illustrious; and, year by year, that august assembly is teaching a deeper and grander lesson to all who serve their brief hour in these more ephemeral Houses of Congress. And now, two places of great honor have just been most nobly filled.

I can well understand that the State of Massachusetts, embarrassed by her wealth of historic glory, found it difficult to make the selection. And while the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was so fittingly honoring his State by portraying that happy embarrassment, I was reflecting that the sister-State of Virginia will encounter, if possible, a still greater difficulty when she comes to make the selection of her immortals. One name I venture to hope she will not select; a name too great for the glory of any one State. I trust she will allow us to claim Washington as belonging to all the States, for all time. If she shall pass over the great distance that separates Washington from all others, I can hardly imagine how she will make the choice from her crowded roll. But I have no doubt that she will be able to select two who will represent the great phases of her history as happily and worthily as Massachusetts is represented in the choice she has to-day announced. It is difficult to imagine a happier combination of great and beneficent forces than will be presented by the representative heroes of these two great States.

Virginia and Massachusetts were the two focal centers from which sprang the life-forces of this Republic. They were, in many ways, complements of each other, each supplying what the other lacked, and both uniting to endow the Republic with its noblest and most enduring qualities.

To-day, the House has listened with the deepest interest to the statement of those elements of priceless value contributed by the State of Massachusetts. We have been instructed by the clear and masterly analysis of the spirit and character of that Puritan civilization, so fully embodied in the lives of Winthrop and Adams. I will venture to add, that notwithstanding all the neglect and contempt with which England regarded her Puritans two hundred years ago, the tendency of thought in modern England is to do justice to that great force which created the Commonwealth, and finally made the British Islands a land of liberty and law. Even the great historian Hume was compelled reluctantly to declare that—

> The precious spark of liberty had been kindled and was preserved by the Puritans alone; and it was to this sect that the English owe the whole freedom of their constitution.

What higher praise can posterity bestow upon any people than to make such a confession? Having done so much to save liberty alive in the mother-country, the Puritans planted, upon the shores of this New World, that remarkable civilization whose growth is the greatness and glory of our Republic.

Indeed, before Winthrop and his company landed at Salem, the Pilgrims were laying the foundations of civil liberty. While the Mayflower was passing Cape Cod and seeking an anchorage, in the midst of the storm, her brave passengers sat down in the little cabin and drafted and signed a covenant which contains the germ of American liberty. How familiar to the American habit of mind are these declarations of the Pilgrim covenant of 1620:

> That no act, imposition, law, or ordinance be made or imposed upon us at present or to come but such as has been or shall be enacted by the consent of the body of freemen or associates, or their representatives legally assembled.

The New England town was the model, the primary cell, from which our Republic was evolved. The town meeting was the germ of all the parliamentary life and habits of Americans.

John Winthrop brought with him the more formal organization of

New England society; and, in his long and useful life, did more than perhaps any other to direct and strengthen its growth.

Nothing, therefore, could be more fitting, than for Massachusetts to place in our Memorial Hall the statue of the first of the Puritans, representing him at the moment when he was stepping on shore from the ship that brought him from England, and bearing with him the charter of that first political society which laid the foundations of our country; and that near him should stand that Puritan embodiment of the logic of the Revolution, Samuel Adams. I am glad to see this decisive, though tardy, acknowledgment of his great and signal services to America. I doubt if any man equaled Samuel Adams in formulating and uttering the fierce, clear, and inexorable logic of the Revolution. With our present habits of thought, we can hardly realize how great were the obstacles to overcome. Not the least was the religious belief of the fathers—that allegiance to rulers was obedience to God. The thirteenth chapter of Romans was to many minds a barrier against revolution stronger than the battalions of George III:

> Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God.

And it was not until the people of that religious age were led to see that they might obey God and still establish liberty, in spite of kingly despotism, that they were willing to engage in war against one who called himself "king by the grace of God." The men who pointed out the pathway to freedom by the light of religion as well as of law, were the foremost promoters of American Independence. And of these, Adams was unquestionably chief.

It must not be forgotten that while Samuel Adams was writing the great argument of liberty in Boston, almost at the same time, Patrick Henry was formulating the same doctrines in Virginia. It is one of the grandest facts of that grand time that the Colonies were thus brought, by an almost universal consent, to tread the same pathway, and reach the same great conclusions.

But most remarkable of all is the fact that, throughout all that period, filled as it was with the revolutionary spirit, the great men who guided the storm, exhibited the most wonderful power of self-restraint. If I were to-day to state the single quality that appears to me most admirable among the fathers of the Revolution, I should say it was this: that amidst all the passions of war, waged against a perfidious enemy from beyond the sea, aided by a savage enemy on our own shores, our fathers exhibited so wonderful a restraint, so great a care to observe the forms of law, to protect the rights of the minority, to preserve all those great rights that had come down to them from the common law, so that when they had achieved their independence they were still a law-abiding people.

In that fiery meeting in the old South church, after the Boston massacre, when, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, three thousand voices almost lifted the roof from the church in demanding the removal of the regiments, it is noted by the historian that there was one, solitary, sturdy "nay" in the vast assemblage; and Samuel Adams scrupulously recorded the fact that there was one dissentient. It would have been a mortal offense against his notions of justice and good order, if that one dissentient had not had his place in the record. And, after the regiments had been removed, and after the demand had been acceded to that the soldiers who had fired upon citizens should be delivered over to the civil authorities to be dealt with according to law, Adams was the first to insist and demand that the best legal talent in the Colony should be put forward to defend those murderers; and John Adams and Josiah Quincy were detailed for the purpose of defending them. Men were detailed whose hearts and souls were on fire with the love of the popular cause; but the men of Massachusetts would have despised the two advocates, if they had not given their whole strength to the defense of the soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, this great lesson of self-restraint is taught in the whole history of the Revolution; and it is this lesson that to-day, more perhaps, than any other we have seen, we ought to take most to heart. Let us seek liberty and peace, under the law; and, following the pathway of our fathers, preserve the great legacy they have committed to our keeping.

The question being taken, the resolutions of the Senate were unanimously concurred in.

And then, on motion of Mr. REAGAN, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: The petition of Mary Barr, widow of Martin Barr, late a private in the One hundred and forty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRADFORD: The petition of citizens of Clay County, Alabama, for the establishment of a post-route from Delta, by way of Flint Hill to Union, Clay County, Alabama, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama: The petition of citizens of Jackson County, Alabama, for the extension of route No. 17115, Alabama service, from Paint Rock Station to Princeton in said county, so as to connect with route 17 from Larkinsville to Hunt's Station, in the State of Tennessee, to the same committee.

By Mr. CHITTENDEN: The petition of Baldwin Cann, late first lieutenant Fourth New York Volunteer Cavalry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FELTON: The petition of Isaac Sewell, of Cobb County, Georgia, who remained loyal to the Government of the United States during the late war, for a rehearing of his claim for $1,380 for property taken and used by the United States Army, rejected by the southern claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Charles J. Shepard, of Cobb County, Georgia, who remained loyal to the Government of the United States during the late war, for a rehearing of his claim for $1,695.50 for property taken and used by the United States Army, rejected by the southern claims commission, to the same committee.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Sarah Howells, widow of Thomas Howells, deceased, late a private in Company C, Nineteenth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GLOVER: The petition of John M. Butler, of Washington, District of Columbia, for compensation for work done for the Committee on Jay Cooke Indebtedness and Real-Estate Pool during the recess of Congress, to the Committee of Accounts.

By Mr. HOAR: The petition of T. L. Nelson, president of the board of directors of the Free Public Library of Worcester, Massachusetts, and of the officers of other libraries in various sections of the Union, for the purchase by Congress of the papers of the General Count de Rochambeau, the commander of the French forces sent to aid Washington in our revolutionary struggle for national independence, to the Joint Committee on the Library.

By Mr. HOLMAN: The petition of H. M. Beadle, of Indiana, for the printing by the order of the House of the reports on the Louisiana troubles made to the Forty-third Congress, to the Committee on Printing.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of paragraph 10, of the fourth section of the river and harbor bill of March 3, 1875, the fifth report on the improvement of the South Pass of the Mississippi River, showing the condition of the works on November 18, 1876, by C. B. Comstock, major of engineers; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 2606) for the relief of Catharine Harris;

A bill (H. R. No. 4248) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser, late corporal of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Patrick Noonan, Company G, Fifth United States Infantry;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) authorizing the issue of clothing to Company A, Second Regiment United States Cavalry;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the issue of clothing to Private Francis Hegner, Company F, Seventh Cavalry, and Private John C. Collins, Company G, Seventh Cavalry; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 177) authorizing the issue of clothing to Sergeant Herman Theune, Company I, Twenty-third United States Infantry.

The bill (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 4246) to provide for the holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Bay City, Michigan, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the report of R. W. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a joint memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in which it is represented that "several years since the United States authorized and directed a geological survey of the then Territory of Oregon, and made a limited appropriation therefor, but, owing to an extensive field proposed to be examined and the limited allowance made for the same, but little work of importance was accomplished." It is further represented "that the geology of Oregon is of the most interesting character; that there are indications of vast beds of coal and iron, the most valuable lodes of silver and gold and other precious metals; that no undeveloped region of the United States offers better prospects for the investment of capital in mining than the State of Oregon." It respectfully prays therefore "that Congress will make an appropriation in the interest of science and general commerce to defray the expenses of a scientific and thorough geological survey of this part of the public domain." I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS presented additional papers in relation to the claim of John Y. Worthington for compensation for wood furnished the United States troops during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of John S. Marmaduke, of Missouri, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 47) for the relief of John Cummins, late collector and disbursing agent of the United States internal-revenue district of Idaho, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Robert Johnston, late collector of internal revenue for the third district of Alabama, reported adversely thereon, and moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David J. Browne, an alien resident of Mississippi, praying for indemnity for eight hundred and fifty-six bales of cotton destroyed by United States forces during the war of the rebellion, reported adversely thereon, and moved that the claim be rejected; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3503) for the relief of Philip Rohr, of Virginia, for tobacco seized for use of the Army, in connection with additional papers or proofs, again recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed and that the claim be rejected.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of H. H. Lemmon, late a member of the Capitol police, praying compensation for damages sustained by falling through a trap-door at the Capitol in the discharge of his duties, ask to be discharged from its further consideration. In that connection we also desire to state that if this person has anything that can approach a claim upon the Government it is a matter that appeals alone to the clemency or grace of Congress, and as such resolutions usually come as a voluntary matter from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds we ask to be discharged, as far as we are concerned, and that the claim as a claim be rejected.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 165) for the relief of Michael W. Brock, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers, have had the same under consideration and find this to be the state of the case: This bill was passed at the last Congress, went to the President and was vetoed by him; and it was returned with the President's message setting forth the grounds on which he was unable to approve the bill. The matter has been again referred to the War Department, and from the evidence now received from that Department we are satisfied that the bill should not have passed originally; and we now recommend, therefore, that the bill be indefinitely postponed and the claim rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. What bill is that?

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill for the relief of Michael W. Brock.

Mr. CONKLING. For what?

Mr. WRIGHT. He was a volunteer in a regiment of Tennessee cavalry and claimed $225 for some property that was charged to him, that he said was improperly charged.

The report was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire, before I take my seat, to give notice that I shall on Friday morning, if able to obtain the floor, ask the Senate to proceed, immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes. In giving this notice at this time, I desire to say that there is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary which sets forth the entire facts very fully. I do not propose to discuss the bill myself, but I think it will be my duty to call it up at that time, and, if I can, to obtain the action of the Senate upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that the Central Branch bill so called?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1094) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress among the several States according to the ninth census;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1095) for the relief of George A. Schreiner; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LAW OF DOWER IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no resolutions this morning, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2043) to improve the law in relation to dower in the District of Columbia, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary on the 25th of July last.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That one third in value of all the equitable estate in real property owned and held by the husband within the District of Columbia at any time during the marriage, to which the wife has made no relinquishment of her right, shall be set apart to said wife as her dower-right in such property. Said dower may be assigned specifically by metes and bounds or as of a third part of the net annual value of the rents, issues, and profits of the lands and tenements or interest therein, in which the dower right exists.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "An act in relation to dower in the District of Columbia."

PROPOSED TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] may have risen for the same purpose as myself, and, if so, I yield to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion pending is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to say that there are some reasons why the motion should prevail, and I hope it will prevail, not for the reason for which the Senator from Missouri seeks a reconsideration, but for another and a different reason, which, if the Senate takes up the bill, will be indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is reconsidered and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] has some amendments which he will offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to its third reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill had its third reading.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now open to amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I propose to amend the bill by adding after the word "provisions" in line 4 of section 2 the words "respecting other Territories," and by inserting in the same line after the word "one" the words "and also in sections 1907, 1909, 1910, 1912, 1923, and 1935;" so as to read:

That the said Territory of Pembina, and the several officers thereof, shall be invested with all the rights, powers, and privileges, and shall be subject to all the regulations, restrictions, and provisions respecting other Territories, contained in chapter 1, and also in sections 1907, 1909, 1910, 1912, 1923, and 1935, of title 24, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except as is herein otherwise provided.

This amendment is proposed simply for the purpose of making the reference in the statute to the existing provisions of law more clear and distinct as applicable to this Territory. I have conferred with the chairman of the committee and he is himself satisfied that without such an amendment the provisions which are named in those sections will not apply to the Territory of Pembina.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have examined the matter to which the Senator from Maine alludes, and I believe that the amendment is necessary and proper, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now offer another amendment as an additional section to the bill. Let it be read and I think it will speak pretty clearly just what it means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as section 7 to the bill the following:

That all laws enacted by the legislative authority of the Territory of Dakota in force in that part of said Territory which by the provisions of this act is contained in the Territory of Pembina shall continue in full force therein, so far as applicable thereto and consistent with the laws of the United States, subject to be amended and repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory of Pembina; and, until otherwise provided by such legislative authority, all persons holding office or places of trust under said law shall continue to hold and exercise the same during the terms for which they may respectively have been elected or appointed; and all actions returnable to or pending in district courts of the Territory of Dakota held in counties contained by the provisions of this act in the Territory of Pembina may be entered, heard, and determined in the district courts of the Territory of Pembina to be held at the same times and places now fixed by law for the holding of district courts therein until such times and places shall be changed by the governor or legislative authority of said Territory. The district courts of said Territory of Pembina may issue executions on unpaid judgments heretofore recovered in counties contained in said Territory, and may do and perform therein all acts which the district courts of the Territory of Dakota could do or perform if said Territory of Pembina had not been established; and the necessary records for the performance of such acts, or copies of such records, shall be transferred to or deposited with said courts of the Territory of Pembina.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the amendment will suggest itself as proper to every Senator who has listened to it. It is, first, to prevent an interregnum between the time when this Territory shall become such and when its governmental machinery shall be at work, and it provides that the officers there by virtue of the law of Dakota now shall remain until that takes place, and it is designed to preserve also the rights of all existing suits. I think that is about all there is in it; and it is eminently proper, I think, that the amendment should be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I desire to change the name of this proposed new Territory from Pembina to some Indian name. I would prefer myself the name of Algonquin, because it is the name of a numerous tribe of Indians that may be called a nation of Indians, because from that large nationality, to use that word, have sprung many tribes. But the name is objected to by many persons because it does not sound very well and is rather long, and my friends around me here suggest the name of Huron as being a very proper name. As it is a short name, sounds well, and is sonorous and beautiful I suggest that the name be changed to Huron. I am rather anxious to retain some of these Indian names as a part of the history of our country. I think it is well to retain these little links of history and also to retain names that are handsome. Now, Pembina is not a handsome name; it is not a historic name; it is not an Indian name.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend, if he wants to take one of the names of the old tribes, why not take that surviving longest, the name of Wyandotte? It is one of the old Indian tribes that has survived longest.

Mr. BOGY. I have no objection. I have no choice. I prefer the name of Algonquin myself because it is a generic name. The Wyandottes were Algonquins; the Hurons were Algonquins. The Algonquin tribe was the most numerous tribe on the shores of the Atlantic, and extended from the bay of Chesapeake away up into the State of Maine, and occupied all this vast country. Pocahontas was an Algonquin; and the Hurons, the Wyandottes, the Delawares, the Senecas, and many other tribes of Indians were Algonquins. I have no particular choice. My object is only to retain an appropriate name and a historic name, peculiar to our country, and at the same time one that will sound well.

As I was saying a while ago, the name of Pembina is not an Indian name; it is a corruption of two French words. Pem is a corruption of the French word that means "bread" and bina is a corruption of the old béni, "holy," or holy bread; that is the origin of the term. I am familiar with it, and have traced it up. It is even pronounced very awkwardly. It is called Pembinaw, when, in point of fact, it is Pembi'na.

Mr. MORTON. What is there out there that it is called from?

Mr. BOGY. That region of country is called the Pembina region. There is a large river flowing from the boundary line of the United States, I think, into Hudson's Bay, called Pembina; but these are all new names of modern growth. The name of Pembina was given to a plant that was found there, an acid plant. I suggest a change of name; whether it be called Huron or Wyandotte I have no particular choice. I will, however, suggest the name of Huron; but, if any gentleman prefers another Indian name, I have no objection.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if I am correctly informed, that section of country is occupied by the Sioux tribe of Indians. There are four powerful nations among the Sioux—the Yanktons, the Brûlés, the Sissetons, and the Ogallaleas. I should think the name of Ogallalea would be a very good name.

Mr. BOGY. The Ogallaleas are not in that locality.

Mr. SPENCER. I think they are.

Mr. BOGY. No; they are not within the Territory.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought they were.

Mr. BOGY. The Yanktons are not in that region of country. They are away west. They are Sioux Indians, but they are not in that portion of the country. The Sissetons are there, but not the Yanktons or the Ogallaleas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not know that it is a matter of very great importance what name shall be given to this Territory, I am opposed, however, and I know the people now there are opposed to the name of Algonquin which has been formerly suggested by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator claims that Algonquin is a proper name because it is the generic name of the Indian tribes which formerly inhabited the country from the Potomac to Maine. It might, therefore, be applied to a Territory within that geographical limit; but I do not see the historic application of that name to a Territory thousands of miles away from that locality.

So far as the name Huron is concerned, which the Senator now suggests, and as I understand proposes as an amendment in lieu of the name which is now given to the Territory by the bill, I do not know that there is any particular and specific objection among the inhabitants there to that particular name. I have none; but I do not see that it is particularly either a more musical or a prettier name than Pembina. I have a letter here from the Delegate who now represents the Territory, which is very short, and with the permission of the Senate I will read it. This letter is addressed to me and is dated December 8, 1876. It is as follows:

Knowing that a motion is pending in the Senate to change the name of the bill to organize the Territory of Pembina to Algonquin, I desire to state to you that during the last two months I have traveled over a large portion of the Territory that is now contemplated to be organized, and have made inquiry of many of the residents therein of various nationalities, and I failed to find one person who desired to have the name changed, but all with whom I conversed on the subject are suited and prefer the name of Pembina to any other name.

Very respectfully,

J. P. KIDDER.

That is all I care to say on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri move an amendment?

Mr. BOGY. I move an amendment that the name be changed from "Pembina" to "Huron."

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the Senator had better include in his motion to strike out also wherever the word "Pembina" occurs in the bill and insert "Huron."

Mr. BOGY. Certainly, to make the correction in the whole bill, wherever the name occurs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be understood as covering the name wherever it occurs in the bill. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we have not selected the best name. There are several names that might be taken, and I think we should take one of the names of the old tribes formerly in New York. I think we had better take the name of Wyandotte or Seneca, or some of the names from the old New York Indians. "Huron" I do not think is an Indian name, though I am not prepared to go exactly into the derivation of it; it is certainly not so harmonious to my ear as some other names. The names of the New York Indians are very beautiful, Wyandotte, Seneca, Miami; and besides, the Wyandotte are altogether the most powerful of all these Indian tribes, now merged and all of them citizens of the United States. They became very wealthy while occupying for a long time a reservation in Ohio, and gradually moved to Kansas and there became Christianized and civilized and have been ingrafted on our population. The Hurons I think disappeared long ago as a tribe and never were anything like as important as either of the other tribes named. They were also in Ohio. At the same time in choosing a name we ought to take a euphonious name, and if we take an Indian name we ought to take one representing a powerful and strong Indian tribe. If it is in order, therefore, I will move to insert Wyandotte.

Mr. BOGY. The Hurons are one of the remnants of the Six Nations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but they disappeared long ago.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and others. Let it go.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care much about it. I will not press my amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended by striking out "Pembina" and inserting "Huron."

SAMUEL T. ANDERSON.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of the administrator of Samuel T. Anderson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, which refers the claim of Daniel G. Wright, as administrator of the estate of Samuel T. Anderson, late naval storekeeper United States Navy, for compensation on account of extra services rendered by Anderson as acting purser and superintendent of transportation during the war of 1812, to the Court of Claims, with authority to adjust the same on principles of equity and justice.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the 13th of July, 1876:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Girard Wright, administrator of the estate of Samuel T. Anderson, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

When the war of 1812 broke out, Samuel T. Anderson was naval storekeeper at the New York navy-yard, and was taken by Commodore Chauncey to the lakes as his confidential clerk, with the rank of chaplain. His duty, as assigned him, was to superintend the transportation of ordnance, provisions, &c., from Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and elsewhere, to the lakes. He was also charged with the duties of acting purser, all of which he faithfully performed.

He remained in the service until August, 1813, and while on duty contracted a disease, resulting in total deafness, thereby rendering it impossible for him (by reason of said disability) to do any business, and this appears to be very clear from the papers before us.

It also appears that during his service he was a most valuable public servant, and his efforts in behalf of the Government have been highly commended by all the officers connected with him in the discharge of his official duties.

After many years of struggle against continued misfortunes and privations, the sequence of his disability, he applied for a pension, and the Secretary of the Navy, on the 10th of March, 1846, ordered his name to be placed upon the pension-roll at the rate of $20 per month, to date from July, 1844. He claimed during his life-time that the Government should pay him for the extra services performed as acting purser and superintendent of transportation, and his administrator now asks that the Court of Claims be empowered to adjust this whole matter on principles of equity and justice.

The services rendered were highly meritorious, and the committee are of the opinion that his legal representative should receive additional compensation for them, the amount to be left to the sound discretion of the court, when the facts susceptible of proof shall have been placed before them. They report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I dislike to object to the consideration of a claim so venerable as that. Its age certainly ought to entitle it to respect. It might be said to be one of that class of claims whose hoary top is bald with dry antiquity. Something over sixty years have elapsed, according to the report, since these services were rendered, and unless there is some stronger reason than appears in the report for a re-opening of the case and re-investigating it, it appears to me the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the cause of the case being one of long antiquity has been owing to the fact that the bill has passed one or other of the Houses of Congress constantly; but, by reason of neglect on the part of some person who had the bill in charge, it has failed in obtaining the sanction of the other House at the same Congress. It has been passing backward and forward, allowance having been made in some of the bills for thirty years.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the amount involved?

Mr. WHYTE. But a very few hundred dollars, probably not over a thousand dollars, or two thousand dollars at the outside. The family are in very indigent circumstances, and the case has been passed upon, as I say, by the Committee on Naval Affairs over and over again favorably. This is merely to submit the question to the Court of Claims, and, if the proof is sufficient to justify an allowance, that the administrator of the deceased may have an opportunity of collecting the small amount that may be found due.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say just one word in reference to this matter. As I understand from the report, these services were rendered some sixty-odd years ago. The Senator from Maryland makes explanation for the delay in the fact that the claim has been passing between the two Houses and there has never been concurrence. I think, in the first place, the very antiquity of this claim should be an all-sufficient reason why there should be no allowance. I think, in the next place, the provision here that the court make such allowance as equity and justice may admit, opens the door to this: that the Court of Claims may feel compelled not only to allow this claim but interest for the entire time, following the decision that they have made in a very similar case. I think this bill ought at least to be so framed as that there should be no allowance of interest back of the time that the demand was made. As it is now, should the claim be, say, $400 or $500, it will be seen at once that the amount of interest would so accumulate that it would be a very large claim against the Government. I shall vote against the claim upon the ground that I see no reason why it should not have been prosecuted long since, and why Congress should not have acted upon it. Not only so, but if the party had a claim he could have gone to the Court of Claims long ago. He has not gone there, and now he asks Congress to allow him to go there and have such allowance as justice and equity may admit. Under that rule, the Government will be compelled to pay upon this old, stale claim five or ten times what they were originally liable for, if there ever was any liability in the case.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask for the reading of the first part of the report. If I understood the report correctly, it states that this Mr. Anderson was holding an office in the service of the Government, for which I suppose he was paid, and this claim is for compensation for performing services not required by the office which he held; but it still remains true that he was receiving pay from the Government during this period of time.

Mr. WRIGHT. And he received a pension also.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It would be safe to assert that there are thousands of persons living now who have, while holding office for which they were receiving compensation, performed other and different duties for which they have received no special recompense from the Government, and this case does not differ from hundreds of cases that arise every year in every Department of the Government.

In the next place, I agree with the Senator from Iowa that if this claim is to be sent to the Court of Claims it should be sent there to be adjudicated upon by the law as it was when this service was performed. On "principles of justice and equity" very likely the claimant will get a commission for whatever money may have passed through his hands, which, instead of being a thousand dollars, may be ten or twenty thousand dollars with the accumulation of interest. But whether the claim should be great or small, it is a claim which the Government ought not to entertain for a moment unless they intend to open the door to thousands of others equally good with this. Within my own experience as the head of a Department, I should say there were at least a thousand persons who have claims of this sort upon whom, while serving the Government, duties not required by the law were imposed which they performed.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the report shows that this gentleman was merely a confidential clerk of Commodore Chauncey, and had the rank of chaplain. I presume the Senator from Massachusetts knows that at that time a chaplain received no pay from the Government of the United States. Consequently according to the papers he was not in the actual service of the United States, was a mere secretary to Commodore Chauncey, and he rendered these valuable services, all of which have been certified to by the officers at that time. He was not paid for them; but thirty years after the service was rendered he was placed upon the pension-roll and for a few years he drew a small pension. It is a case which has been before Congress for years and years and it is quite hard that now its antiquity should be set up as an objection to it. Although he has been at the doors of Congress asking according to the papers for more than thirty years that his claim may be disposed of in some way, I hardly think its age under such circumstances ought to operate against its justice.

I have no objection, if there is any danger of the case being swelled by enormous charges of interest, to the insertion of the words "without interest," so that his heirs will get only pay for services actually rendered, although it comes at this late day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill for present consideration.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 11; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on the motion?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not insist on his motion, and the bill is not taken up.

THOMAS VAN DUZEN.

Mr. BOGY. I move to take up House bill No. 1026.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1026) for the relief of Thomas Van Duzen and his assigns for lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that by the organic act of Washington Territory, approved March 2, 1853, sections 16 and 36 of the public lands in each township were reserved for school purposes; that the Legislature of Washington Territory, by an act passed January 23, 1863, did authorize the board of county commissioners of any county to sell at private sale such portions of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as were by prior settlement in the bona fide possession of any person at the time of the approval of the organic act; that the county commissioners of Jefferson County, in that Territory, did, at a regular term thereof, held at the county seat on the 3d of February, 1864, under and by virtue of the power given in the act of January 23, 1863, sell and convey to Thomas Van Duzen, for $1.50, gold coin, per acre, the northeast quarter of section 36, township 29, range 1 west, he being a bona fide settler on that land prior to the passage of the organic act; and that the sale and conveyance were made in good faith, and with the belief that the county commissioners had power to make it, and the money has gone into the common-school fund of the Territory, and that Thomas Van Duzen and his assigns have made valuable improvements on the land, and are without remedy. Therefore the bill confirms the title to the tract named unto Thomas Van Duzen, his heirs and assigns, in fee-simple.

Mr. BOGY. This is a bill reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims. If it is desired by the Senate, I can explain it. It is altogether very proper. If there is any objection, I will explain the bill, although it is so worded that it explains itself.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the bill will pass. I think it is very meritorious.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the reason that the title was not confirmed to Mr. Van Duzen?

Mr. BOGY. I will state. Under the organic law organizing the Territory of Washington it was provided that the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections should be set apart for school purposes, providing at the same time that if any portion of those sections were occupied by pre-emptors the pre-emptors' rights should be respected, and that the Territory should have the right to locate elsewhere the same quantity of land. This man was a pre-emptor, and the Territory of Washington sold the land, believing they had the right to sell it. And the money has been appropriated to school purposes. By the ruling of the Land Commissioner it is now decided that that land was occupied at the time of the passage of the act, and it was not optional with the Territory of Washington to take that land, but it was compelled to locate elsewhere the same quantity of land. The courts of Washington Territory had decided differently. Nevertheless, there is a shadow of title in the United States. By the passage of this bill the Government does not lose one acre of land; it only makes this man's title good. It is recommended by our committee and by the Land Department; it has passed the House, and it only makes his title good to the one hundred and sixty acres of land within the thirty-sixth section.

Mr. INGALLS. Was Mr. Van Duzen the pre-emptor of the land to whom it was sold by the local authorities?

Mr. BOGY. He was the pre-emptor of the land, and as a pre-emptor the property was sold to him and he paid $1.50 an acre, which was the minimum price, and the money has gone into the school fund. Now, under the ruling of the Land Commissioner it is made the duty of the Territory in a case of that kind to take land elsewhere and to respect this pre-emptor's right. Now he himself comes here to us to make his title good, he having made valuable improvements, and he wants the Government to relinquish what title there may be in the United States to him.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there an adverse claim?

Mr. BOGY. There is no adverse claim. The bill went to the Committee on Private Land Claims and met the approbation of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and I think that is pretty good evidence that it is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. If he had not acted on the faith of the Territory of Washington, he would have been entitled to his land elsewhere, but he did act in good faith on the course taken by the Territory.

Mr. BOGY. The Government is not affected to the extent of an acre of land. It only makes this man's location good in that place. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate accepting the statues of John Winthrop and Samuel Adams in the name of the United States, and extending the thanks of Congress to the State of Massachusetts for these memorials of two of her eminent citizens.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MORTON. The bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Herman Hulman, of Terre Haute, Indiana, was reported back adversely in July last and indefinitely postponed. I think there was a misunderstanding about it, and I desire to have the bill recommitted. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4120, known as the pension appropriation bill. It will occupy only five or ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations recommend the passage of this bill as it came from the House. The House bill conforms exactly to the estimates of the Department. The bill is $1,000,500 less than last year's appropriation bill for the same purpose. Unless some gentleman desires some further statement about it I shall not say anything further. The decrease is due to the falling off in the number of pensioners.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill was discussed at considerable length in the Committee on Appropriations and information asked of the Commissioner of Pensions. The information given on certain questions was not satisfactory to myself and I have endeavored in a personal interview at the Pension Office to get an explanation of the large amount that is reported to have been paid over the amount needed to pay the pension-roll, which is between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000; I will give the exact figures hereafter. So as to get the information for another year as to what that two or three millions is for, I offer an amendment which I hope will be acceptable to the chairman. It does not limit the amount at all, but will cause additional information in the next annual report. The wording of the amendment I am not particular about, so that the substance is secured. I ask the chairman to listen to the amendment, and if he approves it to agree to it, or if he suggests any change to carry out the object I shall make no objection.

In line 13, after the word "interior," I move to insert:

Which shall be stated in the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions; and hereafter he shall report the total annual amounts paid on additions, also reductions in the pension-roll.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from West Virginia was kind enough to submit that proposition to me a few moments since. I am not authorized by the committee to accept it, but I see no objection to it. It will give a little additional information in the next report.

Mr. DAWES. Is not the information already given?

Mr. WINDOM. He states the number of pensioners and the amount paid them; but he does not give the amount as it is affected by the reductions and the additions to the roll.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that that provision, while it is just and meritorious, ought not to be placed as a burden on the pension appropriation bill. If it is adopted it requires the House to act upon it and still further delays the passage of the bill. The information that the Senator desires to obtain can be very readily secured by addressing a resolution, which the Senate will pass undoubtedly, to the Commissioner of Pensions to provide for the incorporation of that information in his report next year. I should think it ought not to go on the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Senator from West Virginia proceeds, I was going to suggest that the only objection I see to his amendment is that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and might as well be provided for elsewhere. I see no objection to it in itself; but perhaps we had better not encumber an appropriation bill with it.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be noticed that it is not legislation, but asking in the next annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions additional information. The Pension Bureau now gives the total reduction made yearly as well as the addition to the number of pensioners, but fails to state the amount which the reductions make or the additions make in the sum paid. The Commissioner is required now to give an account of the incidental expenses of the office, which, by the approval of the Secretary, are provided for by him. My amendment adds but one thing; and that is, that in his next annual report where he states the number of pensioners and the number of the reductions on the pension-roll and the additions to it, he shall also state the amounts that the roll is affected thereby. Such a provision I do not think is legislation. It is true it is amending the bill; but there can be no objection to it; it goes with the bill. The object is certainly desirable. Take the Pension Commissioner's report and you will find that he tells you on page 7 that the whole number of pensioners on the roll required the payment of $25,526,324.69. On the same page you will find that he says there was paid on account of pensions last year $28,354,569.69; which is a difference of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000.

It will be recollected that last year when this same bill was before us there was a question as to the amount necessary to be appropriated. An amendment was offered then calling for an explanation in the next annual report of the difference between what the roll amounts to and what is said to be actually paid. It will of course be kept in mind by all Senators that in the legislative appropriation bill provision is made for the expenses for clerk hire, officers, &c., and there is a special provision in the present bill, as there has been in other bills, for all other incidental expenses of the Pension Bureau. Hence it is a mystery to me, and to others who have examined this subject, what becomes of the difference between the amount of the annual roll and the amount said to have been paid. The difference, as I have stated, is between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000. There ought to be some explanation. The Committee on Appropriations called for an explanation and one was given. I looked at it as carefully as I knew how, and, while it gives some reasons and explains some portion of this $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, yet it just says in wholesale that a large proportion of it comes from the additions to the roll. We know that the roll is decreasing. Last year, according to the Commissioner's report, the roll decreased twenty-six hundred and eighty-four names. That was the total reduction after having given the additions made during the year. Now, instead of the amount paid being more than the roll called for, it occurs to me it ought to have been less. Why? Because the number of pensioners is decreasing. The year commences with July, for instance. On the next day, probably, some one dies or some child becomes of age, some widow remarries, thus reducing the roll. It is true there are new cases added by legislation of Congress and some by examination at the Pension Office, but that number is much less than the decrease; so that the two or three million I spoke of is unaccounted for in the report of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that when this bill was under discussion at the last session the chairman of the Committee on Pensions——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me? I do not wish this bill to displace the regular order, but I do not object to its going on for a few minutes. If there is going to be a long discussion over this bill, I shall call for the regular order, because I am anxious to have it disposed of to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. So far as I am concerned, unless there is some additional cause to what I now know, there will not be a long discussion. Perhaps ten minutes will suffice for me to say all that I desire to say. Calling for the regular order is a matter with the Senator himself. This is an appropriation bill, which is generally given precedence.

Mr. WINDOM. I appeal to the Senator from Oregon to pass by informally the regular order for a few moments. I think we can conclude this bill very soon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The regular order will be laid aside informally, subject to be called up by any Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about saying that the able and accurate chairman of the Committee on Pensions, [Mr. INGALLS,] in discussing this bill last year, stated in substance that in his opinion one-sixth of the amount appropriated was improperly applied. Again, in the same statement, if I recollect aright that Senator's remark, he said that he believed that $5,000,000 per annum was in some way improperly paid out upon pensions, of course intimating that it was done fraudulently by fraudulent claims and by persons continuing on the roll when their pensions ought to have ceased. But there is, in my judgment, a large amount on the pension-roll that ought to be carefully looked into, and I hardly think we can have too much information. It will need very little work to furnish what I desire, and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object to what belongs to the bill going upon it. The amendment asks additional information only as to the number of pensioners. The increases and decreases are given already, and now we ask the amount that is thereby added to or taken from the roll per annum. I hope the chairman will accept the amendment. If it is not in proper shape, I am perfectly willing that it should be put in any shape that the chairman or any other member may desire, so that it brings the information.

I have stated as plainly as I could that the roll, as given by the Commissioner of Pensions, amounts to twenty-five and a half million dollars, while there is said to have been paid out $28,354,000. There is certainly room for inquiry between these two amounts. Taking into consideration the fact that the expenses of the office in this city are put upon the legislative bill, and when you consider the further fact that the bill now before us appropriates specific sums for the different objects, such as pension agents, examining surgeons, and all other expenses belonging to the Department, and makes a separate appropriation for Navy and other pensions, and when you also remember that the amount paid for pensions is growing less each year, (which is very gratifying to the country, and so far as that is concerned it is gratifying not only to the country but to myself and to others who look into this matter,) the propriety of the amendment is apparent. There should also be borne in mind the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, that he believed there were $5,000,000 per annum improperly paid out; and certainly in view of all these facts an amendment ought not to be objected to which will secure some explanation of the difference between the amount on the roll and the amount actually paid.

Mr. WINDOM. I can more briefly answer the honorable Senator from West Virginia by asking the Secretary to read a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions. Before doing so, however, I wish to refer to his matter of congratulation to the country that the pension list is decreasing. I doubt whether it is a matter entirely gratifying in all respects that the old pensioners are dying off so rapidly. But there is another reason why the pension list is decreasing. We refused last session to appropriate money enough to the Surgeon-General's and to the Adjutant-General's Offices to bring up the arrears of pensions, and in their reports this year they inform us that they are two years behind and that it would require fifty additional clerks to bring up the pension applications to-day. So that there are two reasons why the pension-list is rapidly decreasing; one is that the old pensioners are dying off and the other is that we refused to appropriate money enough at the last session of Congress to bring up the present applications, and they are lying back two years behind. I ask the Secretary to read the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions in explanation of this discrepancy to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. DAVIS. One word before that is read. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is undoubtedly right as to the appropriation for limbs, &c.; but he will bear in mind that this bill does not, nor did the bill last year, cover that item. It is another and entirely different appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1876.

SIR: In response to inquiries made in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations by Mr. Cleaves, its clerk, on the 14th instant, to wit—

First. Explanation of the difference in the amounts under the following headings of Table II of my annual report for the year ending June 30, 1876: "Total amount paid for pensions during the year," $28,351,599.69, and "whole number of pensioners and the yearly value of their pensions," $25,596,324.69—

I have the honor to inform you that the last-named sum represents one year's pension only to each of the 232,137 pensioners whose names were on the rolls on the 30th day of June last, while the first-named sum represents the amount of money paid out to pensioners, and includes about $2,500,000 allowed as arrears upon newly adjudicated cases, besides a considerable sum which accrued in cases adjudicated in former years, and not previously paid, because of its being unclaimed, or because payments of the pensions was suspended for some cause. (Failure to demand payment and suspensions happen in many cases each year.) It also includes the salaries and fees of pension agents, as well as the fees paid for medical examinations.

Second. Also an explanation of the apparent discrepancy between the amount stated by the Secretary of the Treasury as paid on account of pensions for the fiscal year 1875, $29,456,216.92, and the amount stated by the Commissioner of Pensions as paid during the same fiscal year, $29,683,116.64.

It is to be remembered that the Commissioner of Pensions is not an auditing officer of pension accounts, but made up this statement as approximately correct, from the data furnished to him by the pension agents. I am not informed how the Secretary of the Treasury made up his figures, and cannot, therefore, make any reliable explanation of the difference, but beg to call your attention to a table in the Third Auditor's report for the same year, accompanying that of the Secretary of the Treasury, found on pages 376 and 377. This shows the payments to the Army pensioners to have been $29,171,179.55, and a table in the Fourth Auditor's report, also accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, found on page 386, shows that an additional sum of $521,829.60 was paid for Navy pensions, which, together with the Third Auditor's figures for payments on account of Army pensions, makes a round sum paid for pensions in 1875 of $29,693,009.15, being $9,892.52 in excess of the statement made by the Commissioner of Pensions. Without knowing it to be the fact, yet I presume this difference upon examination will be found to consist mainly of changes in or corrections of the pension agents' statements made by this office after their receipt by it.

3. The Pension Office requires no appropriation for artificial limbs, &c. Under a law passed at the last session of Congress, the expenditure of moneys for that purpose was turned over to the Surgeon-General, and I presume he has an estimate for such an appropriation.

In a personal interview with Senator DAVIS, of the Committee on Appropriations, on Friday last, he requested me to inform the committee in this letter what annual compensation each pension agent received, and in compliance therewith I annex hereto a sheet showing the salary and fees of each agent for the year ending June 30, 1876. Sections 4781 and 4782 of the Revised Statutes make provision for this compensation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The sheet referred to there gives the amount of compensation of each one of the fifty-eight agencies in the United States; and though the law, as I construe it, and as I believe the Commissioner of Pensions construes it, says that no salary or compensation of the agents shall exceed $4,000 per annum, yet we find from this statement that some of them get as high as $14,000, nearly $15,000 one of them, and several of them between $11,000 and $14,000. The explanation of that, in part, as I understand, is that there are expenses attending the office. But the expenses attending the office of many of these agents are, in my judgment, far in excess of what they ought to be. There ought to be some reduction in many of these offices. At one agency, for instance, where a certain amount of money is distributed, the expenses of the office are a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, while the expenses of another agent, under the same circumstances, disbursing the same amount, are five or six thousand dollars. That is certainly a point that ought to be looked into and properly cared for. But that belongs to the Department, as I understand, and, I take, it it will be looked into.

Mr. President, it will be noticed that the Commissioner does not explain the large difference between the pension-roll and the amount actually paid. The object of the amendment offered by myself is that in the next annual report there shall be some explanation. I presume there is an explanation, but I think the Senate ought to have it in the annual report.

Another important point the Commissioner speaks of is that he cannot tell exactly why the differences in some cases are so very large between the amount reported paid by himself and that reported by the Secretary of the Treasury. If you take the year 1865, for instance, you find that the Secretary of the Treasury says there were $16,347,621.34 paid for pensions, while the Commissioner of Pensions says there were $8,542,885.27 paid the same year—a difference of over seven million dollars. Take the next year, 1866, and the difference is $2,354,000. The year following, 1867, it is two million and a quarter. Certainly the accounts of the Commissioner of Pensions and those of the Treasury as to the amounts paid for a particular year ought to agree more closely, if not exactly, than $7,000,000 or $2,000,000, as the case may be. I have a list in my hand since 1860 of each year, and in no single year, I believe, do the amounts exactly agree between what is reported as having been paid by the Commissioner of Pensions and what the Secretary of the Treasury reports to Congress as having been paid. There is certainly something wrong between these two offices in some form or other. Almost uniformly the amount is increased at the Treasury Department. For instance, take from 1860 to 1870 inclusive, and the difference is over thirteen million dollars. The Commissioner reports that he paid for pensions $13,000,000, or over, less than appears in the reports of the Treasury Department. There ought to be an explanation of why this immense difference between these two Departments in keeping accounts occurs.

The amendment I have offered I think will in some degree be a step in the right direction. Of course it cannot cover all that I think ought to be properly explained; but I hope, without going further into the discussion, that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will admit in some language, in his own language if he does not like mine, some amendment on this bill so that in the next annual report of the Commissioner we shall get more definite information as to the large difference between the annual roll and the amount purporting to have been paid for pensions.

Mr. WINDOM. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that a resolution of inquiry extending back over the years he has named would give us full information on the subject. The letter which I caused to be read from the Commissioner of Pensions I think satisfactorily explains those differences during the last two years. The Senator refers to years prior to those, about which there is no explanation before us, and I have no doubt it would be as satisfactory as any of those that we have already read. I would prefer a resolution asking for information; but, if the Senator insists upon it and the Senate in its discretion thinks it best to insert this amendment, which is somewhat legislative in its character, I see no objection to it except that I see no great advantage that will be derived from it. A resolution of inquiry I think would be better.

Mr. DAVIS. I was unfortunate enough not to make myself properly understood. My object was not so much to go back (though I stated what did occur in previous years) as to secure a remedy for the future. My object is in the next annual report of the Commissioner to get some definite information.

Now, as to a resolution asking for information as to what has taken place, I think, with all respect to the chairman of the committee of which I am a member, we have that information here. It is contained in the reports of the two Departments, that of the Interior and that of the Treasury. As the chairman has no objection to the amendment, I hope no one else will object to it, and that it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution directing an inquiry as to the eligibility of J. W. Watts as an elector for the State of Oregon and the circumstances attending the appointment of electors in that State, on which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] has the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me a moment to give a notice to the Senate? I desire to say to the Senate that after the disposition of the resolution now pending I shall ask the Senate to consider the House bill for perfecting the revision of the laws. It is an important measure, not likely to be an exciting subject of debate.

Mr. DAVIS. For fear that some Senator may have been absent when I gave notice that I should present resolutions relative to the eulogies of my late colleague, Mr. Caperton, I will repeat that the time fixed is soon after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. BOUTWELL. By this notice I did not intend to interfere with that.

Mr. DAVIS. I know that, but I thought it as well to notify the Senate of the fact again.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, had I not been arrested yesterday by a motion to adjourn, it was my intention to terminate my remarks very speedily. It is not my desire this morning to detain the Senate beyond a very few moments.

The question before us has assumed very great importance, and is presented, it seems to me, at an unfortunate time. Nevertheless it is before us and has been forced upon this body, and, of course, the question has to be met. I will briefly restate the argument which I intended to present yesterday. In obedience to the law providing for the election of electors of President and Vice-President on the same day throughout the United States, an election for these officers was held in the State of Oregon. That State is entitled under the law of apportionment to three electors. One of the candidates for elector was by the Constitution of the United States ineligible, because at the time that he was voted for he was holding an office of profit and trust under the Government of the United States. This gentleman, whose name is Watts, received, with his two colleagues on the republican ticket, an undoubted majority of the voters of Oregon. I believe the majority was 1,049 votes. The votes being returned to the office of the secretary of state and counted by that officer, the next step which has to be taken necessarily is a certificate of election to be given by the governor of the State. At this period of the proceedings a protest by the citizens of Oregon is filed and presented to the governor of that State, making known to him the fact that this Mr. Watts, who had received a majority of the votes of that State, was not eligible for the reason that he held at the time an office of profit and trust under the Government of the United States. We are informed that the governor then took the subject under consideration. We are furthermore informed that he considered the subject with great care and for a long time; that he called to his aid the best legal advice of that State, and that he also sent at a distance, so as to avoid any local influence, to obtain the legal advice of a gentleman of great distinction residing in the city of Cincinnati. This legal advice was given to him by this gentleman; and I repeat what I said yesterday, that this man, Judge Hoadly, is a man of great legal ability, of high standing, and the peer of any man in the valley of the Mississippi. His opinion was read here; and although it was severely criticised by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] nevertheless, I say I believe it is correct. I believe the law laid down by him is correct. I believe that the action of the governor of Oregon was a necessity. When the fact was made known to him that Mr. Watts held an office, it was not in his power, acting under the law of his State, the law of the United States, and the Constitution of the United States, to give him a certificate of election; because the law provided that a man in that condition could not be elected.

Then the next question which necessarily comes up is who is to be certified as elected, if anybody? He decided it to be his duty to give the certificate to the person receiving the next highest number of votes after Mr. Watts. I believe that decision to be correct. I believe it to be good law, sustained by the authorities. Gentlemen may quote authorities as much as they please; I believe that to be the correct conclusion, that the person receiving the next highest number of votes under the condition of the case of Oregon should receive the certificate of election.

In addition to this, Governor Grover must have felt it his duty as the chief magistrate of that State to see that it did not lose an electoral vote in the college of electors. But the Senator from Oregon says that the law of Oregon was ample to provide a remedy so as to avoid that contingency. I said yesterday and I repeat to-day that according to my construction of that law it does not provide for filling a vacancy of that kind; that it only provides for filling a vacancy of an elector who being an elector, having been appointed an elector, is unable to attend the meeting of the electors when assembled as a college of electors, or unwilling or prevented by any cause, whether it be by death, by resignation, by sickness, by high water, or by anything else that may possibly happen. If he is not present at the meeting of the college of electors, in that case it becomes the duty of the electors who are there assembled to fill that vacancy. Governor Grover believed, as I believe, that under the law of Oregon this could not be done. I say again that a similar case arose in Vermont and there the Legislature was called together to supply what was necessary to be done. A similar occurrence took place in the State of Rhode Island. There the subject was referred to the supreme court of the State, and I read yesterday an extract from the decision of that court. The Legislature was called to supply what had to be done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the Senator from Missouri the law as amended by the Legislature of the State of Vermont?

Mr. BOGY. I have not. I have been trying to get it and have not been able to obtain it. My impression is that the law of Vermont, the law of Rhode Island, the law of Oregon, the law of Missouri, and the law of every other State on that subject are very similar. I do not mean to say that in all the laws the same words are used, but substantially they are alike.

Hence, in conclusion of this branch of my argument, I cannot see how the governor of Oregon could have done anything else but what he did do. It was not in his power as an honest man and a faithful public officer to have done anything else. He was bound to recognize the fact that one of the men voted for at the election was not eligible.

Mr. President, I have been at a loss, and I am at a loss now, to know how this question has been forced on this body for discussion at the present time. It is upon a resolution introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to refer the subject for investigation to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and before we get a report from that committee, before the subject has been investigated by that or any other committee, it is discussed and virtually and prematurely decided by the Senate. My understanding has always been that the duty of a committee is very much like that of a court. A subject being referred to a committee is to be investigated, the facts are to be ascertained in the best way within the reach of the committee, and the law to be applied to those facts, and whatever conclusion may be the result of a just application of the law to the facts must be the conclusion which the committee will arrive at, regardless of what that may be. But here we are discussing the subject in advance of its reference to the committee, and I may say that we know in advance what will be the action of the chairman of that committee. A subject is to be referred to him and his colleagues on that committee to be investigated by them that they may give the Senate the result of their calm, cool, impartial deliberation; and yet before the subject reaches the committee we have the opinion of the chairman expressed, not once, but frequently and with great ability and great vim in the Senate here. What will be his action as a member of that committee? Sir, it presents a very singular condition of things; and it is a singular thing also to what great importance in modern times this Committee on Privileges and Elections has got. It is the most important committee of the Senate to-day. No man elected by any of the States to a seat in the Senate can set his foot in this Chamber until he has passed through the ordeal of that committee, and many men thus elected have never successfully gone through it. They have failed there and have never reached this body though elected to it. Others have come here that some persons thought ought not to have been admitted; but they went through, fortunately for them. We have to-day a committee called the Committee on Privileges and Elections that assumes all power over the elections of all the States, a power which is enormous; and I will say more, that the power in the hand of the Senator from Indiana is really a great power, for he is himself a man of power; and being at the head of that committee he stands at the head of the Senate and controls it. No man can be a Senator, no matter whether he be elected by his Legislature by a unanimous voice or not, unless he is also elected by the Senator from Indiana; and some men who have been elected by Legislatures, by not receiving his vote, have never been able to set their feet in this Chamber. It reminds me of what we call in modern times a returning board. The Committee on Privileges and Elections has got to be the great returning board of the Senate, regardless of the election, unless the person elected also receives the approbation and the vote of that committee, like the persons voted for in some of the Southern States, who have to go through their returning boards or they do not appear to have been elected.

We have made great improvements in modern times. This country has acquired a high position among the nations of the world as one of great enlightenment, progress in the arts and the sciences, progress in religion, and particularly progress in politics. We had placed ourselves at the front rank of the civilized nations as the teachers of the new doctrine of advanced political civilization, and perhaps this new step of returning boards became a necessity. The nations of Europe are following us very closely. Liberty and free institutions are spreading over all Europe. In England we know the progress there; we know the struggles in Italy; we know the struggles in Spain; we know that France to-day has a republic. As they are coming up on the same platform that we have been occupying for a hundred years, as the leaders of the world in the great science of politics we had to take another step, and the invention of returning boards is the greatest step in the way of political improvement that has ever been made in the history of the human race! There is nothing like a returning board.

It has been stated very often that the majority of the popular vote for Mr. Tilden in the United States was about three hundred thousand. While Mr. Tilden has a majority of three hundred thousand, Mr. Hayes has three returning boards, and the three returning boards are as powerful if not more powerful than the three hundred thousand voters, so that, ciphering the thing down, a returning board is just about equal to a majority of a hundred thousand voters in the United States; and with the growth of the returning board it promises in time, when it becomes a national institution, and we shall have a great national returning board, ahead of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in the hands of able men it will be equal to all the voters of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BOGY. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator that if the returning board in Oregon could carry out his purpose it would be equal to forty-five millions of people.

Mr. BOGY. That is a very good suggestion. I am very much obliged for it; and I will in a few moments, if I do not forget it, (and I hope the Senator will not permit me to forget it,) give him a full answer. The institution of returning boards is one of the most wonderful improvements of modern times, and it is to be regretted that it was not known many years ago. What a useful thing a returning board would have been in England during the days that Wilkes annoyed the ministry so much. Suppose they had had a returning board in the British Parliament, they might have permitted the people to amuse themselves as much as they pleased in the county of Middlesex, and they might have elected Mr. Wilkes every day if they chose, but the returning board would have said, "No, sir, you did not get the majority and therefore you cannot take a seat here." What a good thing it would be for the ministry of England if they would adopt it. A returning board in the hands of the ministry of England would be making a ministry in perpetuity. An efficient returning board with efficient aid, such as the returning board got in New Orleans, could keep a ministry in power forever. It is much to be regretted that it was not known in France in the days of the revolution. What a beautiful institution that would have been in the hands of a man like Robespierre. He was driven to a most cruel mode of keeping himself in the majority of the convention. For that purpose was invented a machine called the guillotine in France. It was a bloody instrument, and was used to cut off the heads of refractory patriots. When such men were returned to the convention in the days of Robespierre, they were guillotined so that he might maintain his majority in the convention. If he had had a returning board, he would have been spared this cruelty which has thrown a shade, a black spot, over his fame; and which was also a very cruel thing for the fellows who were guillotined. It would have been a beautiful institution, and it is to be regretted that it was not known at that day.

A returning board in Oregon, the Senator from Oregon reminds me, has nullified the votes of forty-five millions of people. There are not so many people in Oregon, are there? [Laughter.] What has taken place in Oregon has been a sort of providential thing; it has changed the status of the question in this country; it has changed the position of my distinguished friend from Indiana. He and others believed that a prima facie case was all that was necessary; and whenever a prima facie case was presented that was the end of the question. To make that efficient it was generally understood that the President of the Senate should have the right, as he has under the Constitution, to open the returns, and in addition the right to count the votes. A prima facie case in the hands of the President of the Senate, who has the right to open the votes, and if to that is also added the right to count, would make a returning board the most complete system of political machinery on the face of the earth. There would be nothing like it anywhere. The fact that this thing occurred in Oregon I think is providential, and I am glad that there happened to be a man of integrity governor of that State; a man of will, who dared to face what he knew to be the malignity and the malice of his political opponents. I am glad that there was an honest man of will and of purpose in that State, and he met the question as a true man ought to have met it. That fact returns to us here a prima facie case of one vote for Mr. Tilden, making the magic number of 185, which leaves Mr. Hayes, 184. According to the prima facie law that we were taught but a few weeks ago, that would have been the end of the whole contest; and this discussion would not have taken place here to day, and I should not now be inflicting a speech upon the Senate. But when that return was made, as it ought to have been made, the idea of a prima facie case passed away and you have never heard from that day to this the words prima facie in connection with the question of the presidential election. They have passed out of circulation, nobody talks of a prima facie case now.

But in advance of the discussion, and in advance of the meeting of the two Houses appointed under the Constitution to count these votes, we discuss the Oregon case here. We go behind the returns, we examine everything, and we are to decide, as far as we are concerned, whether the vote of Oregon will be a good vote. We are to decide, as far as we are able, whether the action of the returning board in Louisiana is proper or not. We are also to decide for South Carolina; and also for Florida; and all this has been brought about, in the language of my friend from Oregon, by the returning board of Oregon that has changed the purpose of forty-five millions of people. It is a most fortunate thing, and we are to thank God for it, for it has prevented us from doing a thing that would have been a blot upon the history of this country forever. It has opened this question as it ought to have opened it, and instead of a prima facie case being conclusive, no matter how obtained, through fraud and intimidation and the use of the Army and executive power and the perversion of judicial authority, the question is now open for investigation by the Congress of the United States, and under the eye of the nation. That has been the result of this thing in Oregon, and if that vote had not been returned my friend from Oregon and my friend from Indiana would yet be talking about a prima facie case, and the power would be, as far as they could make it, in the hands of the President of the Senate to count the vote. It was supposed at one time that the now President of the Senate perhaps might have some delicacy as to counting those votes. So the papers said. I am not certain of that, and cannot say whether the statement is exactly correct, but I have some reason to believe it. It was supposed that the President of the Senate perhaps might not be willing to do that, and hence another gentleman who is not now in his seat, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who had committed himself in writing over his name in a letter addressed to myself and others in New Orleans on this subject of a prima facie case, and the right of the President of the Senate to open and count, it was supposed would be selected to become the successor of his illustrious predecessor. But that perhaps has been changed, and in changing that the Senator from Ohio may have lost that position, which is a misfortune for him. But these are rumors perhaps not well founded. I state them as rumors. We who are not in the secret were rather inclined to believe that they are true. The Senator from Indiana can tell whether they are true or not. He knows.

Now all this is changed. Such a thing as a prima facie case is a thing of the past, so much so that we do not even wait for the meeting of the two Houses in their joint session, appointed under the Constitution to count the votes. We open the ballots in advance; we discuss the question in advance; we are discussing it now; we are passing upon it long before the time, far in advance. This change in the relation of things has been brought about by the action of the governor of Oregon. That has been the result, and I think it is fortunate for the country and for free institutions. Otherwise this idea of a returning board having the power to return whom they please as electors and the inability of Congress to go behind that return would soon have established returning boards throughout the United States, and in a very short time the return of the returning boards would have elected a President of the United States, even though not elected by a majority of the people.

As I said a while ago, the idea of returning boards is one of the most wonderful inventions not only of modern times but of all time. There is nothing like it in political science; its power is omnipotent. In New Orleans it is backed by the courts of Louisiana, and my friends say you cannot go behind that; you cannot appeal to the courts there because the supreme court in Louisiana has said there was no appeal from the returning board, it is an omnipotent institution. Very well, that is the law in Louisiana. In South Carolina, where the judiciary happens to be a little different, the court say, "We have a right to look into the doings of the returning board;" and they have reversed the action of the returning board; but then there stand the Army under the President and that says, "You, Mr. Judiciary, have no right to interfere in this thing; we stand by the returning board;" and it makes that returning board efficient. There the judiciary is discarded. So it is in Florida to-day. The judiciary is yet pounding away at the question, but the returning board, backed by the Army in Florida has already passed upon the question and the return of the returning board has been sent to the city of Washington. When you come to look at this condition, in one State the returning board is sustained by the action of the judiciary; in another State it is sustained by executive power through the Army, and in one way or another the returning board is one of the most wonderful institutions of modern times. There is no end to its power. I have no doubt if adopted in Europe that the monarchs of Europe would be able to concede to their subjects that which the nations of the world have for ages been panting for—universal suffrage. Why, sir, Russia could afford to give universal suffrage to all the Russians with a returning board backed by the army of Russia. Let the people vote as they please in Russia, if the Emperor had a returning board and the votes were returned to the great national returning board, what could the Russian people do? They could do as much as in this country; they would have the gratification of voting, that is all; but they could not accomplish anything unless they could in some way or other wipe out that returning board.

The Senator from Indiana spoke the other day of the governor of Oregon, I thought, in rather unkind terms. I think he has as much of human kindness, somewhat mixed perhaps, but as much of it in him as anybody else has. Yet he permitted his feelings, I think, to lead him astray. He likened the offense of the governor of Oregon to that of a suicide; and said that in olden times men who committed suicide were buried alongside of the road or near a cross-roads, so that as the passers-by for all time went along, they could throw a stone upon the grave, and so day by day a monument of infamy would rise to that poor unfortunate man who had committed suicide; and he commenced throwing stones at this governor of Oregon who is not yet dead, and he threw his stone, with all his power, and all his might. He thought that as time rolled on a monument would be erected to him in that way. I do not know that his history is correct. Suicides were thus treated in England under the common law; but I do not know that it was elsewhere so. Let that be as it may, I do not know that the men who commit suicide are so very guilty in the eye of the civil law; they are unfortunate men who are borne down by misfortune, by crosses too heavy to carry in the world.

Mr. MORTON. My friend is mistaken. I did not speak of that as being done in regard to suicides.

Mr. BOGY. Then what character of felons have a stone thrown on their graves?

Mr. MORTON. I said that where a man had been executed for a high crime or was killed while in the act of committing a felony, he was buried by the roadside; and it was the duty of each traveler who went along to throw a stone on his grave.

Mr. BOGY. Then I take that part of my speech back that had any relation to suicide. I misunderstood him. I thought that he stated that the governor of Oregon had committed political suicide.

Mr. MORTON. Not in my friend's mind, but in my own he might.

Mr. BOGY. In conclusion of this whole case I have no hesitation in saying, not as a party man but something beyond and above party, that the occurrence of this affair in Oregon about this vote is a most fortunate thing. It has compelled our friends on the other side to investigate all these questions as they ought to be investigated. It has compelled them to do away with the false idea that under no condition of circumstances could Congress go behind what they called a prima facie case; that although every man in the joint session might know that every vote sent there was the production of fraud and perjury, yet they would be powerless to remedy that thing because they could not go behind a prima facie case. The occurrence of this fact in Oregon has changed that view, and now we come back to examine, and the only thing left is whether we will come to a correct conclusion. I am somewhat afraid that the influence of the Senator from Indiana is too great for the good of the country and that he has already committed himself. I am afraid he has committed himself on the case from my State also, about which there ought to be no doubt. But if that be not so, the fact that this has occurred in Oregon enables us to approach this subject as it should be approached, and ascertain in the best way in our power what has been the honest vote of any State of the Union, and no matter what that vote may be carry it out as the will of the sovereign people. Without this occurrence in Oregon the case could never have been presented in that way. A prima facie case would have been held up to us as the essence of the Constitution, and it would have been asserted that no man could go beyond it.

Mr. President, I am sorry that I have been compelled to detain the Senate this morning. I am anxious to yield because I see that my friend from Indiana is extremely anxious to say something, and therefore I will yield to him, because it always gives me much pleasure to listen to him.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I always listen with pleasure to my distinguished friend from Missouri. However much I may differ from him I know that he speaks in good nature and without malice. My friend says that a returning board is a new invention. I beg leave to take issue with him. Returning boards are older than the Constitution of the United States. There is no State in this Union that has not a returning board. Sometimes they are called boards of canvassers, sometimes they have no particular name, but they consist of a person or persons who are authorized to count the votes and to certify who has been elected. Names go for nothing. In some States these returning boards have discretionary powers, judicial powers, as in the State of Louisiana and other States that might be named. Perhaps there are a dozen or more States in the Union where they have powers conferred upon them to cast out fraudulent or illegal votes within certain rules. In some States they are required simply to count the votes and give the certificate to the man who has got the highest number of votes. There is a returning board in the State of Missouri, there is one in the State of Indiana, one in the State of Oregon, and another in Louisiana. The power which these boards have depends upon the law of the State creating them. It may be a simple power, as in the State of Oregon, to certify the vote, or they may have judicial powers as in the State of Louisiana. Whether there is an appeal from these returning boards if they make a wrong decision, depends upon the law of the State. Unless the law creating them gives to some court the power to supervise their decisions, there is no such power, their decision is final. The thing must end somewhere and must end just where the law provides that it shall end. If the law makes the action of the returning board final, there it must stop. It depends upon the law of the State. The difference between Louisiana and Oregon, of which my friend talks, is that in Oregon the returning board has no discretionary power, no judicial power, but is absolutely required by the law of its creation to certify to the man who has the highest number of votes. It has no power to cast out a fraudulent vote; it has no power to withhold a certificate from a man because he is ineligible; but the law says in express terms that the certificate shall be given to the man who has the highest number of votes. In Louisiana the returning board has a broad judicial power. You may say the law is wrong; but there it is; and I believe that was the law before the rebellion. It has been the law of Louisiana for a good many years. It may be a good or a bad law; but that is the law of Louisiana, giving to its returning board, certain persons appointed for that purpose, the power to pass upon the character of the vote within certain rules.

What we complain of in regard to Oregon is, first, that the governor of Oregon is not the returning board under the law of that State. The secretary of state is the returning board. I read the statute yesterday. The secretary of state is to count the vote, and he is to count it in the presence of the governor. The governor is simply a witness, but is to take no part in it whatever. The secretary of state is the returning board in the State of Oregon, and when he has made out the count the governor shall certify—so says the law—who has the highest number of votes; and that is all he has got to do with it. What we complain of is that the governor of Oregon assumed to be the returning board; that he assumed to have judicial powers when he had none. First, he determined that Watts was not eligible. He had no power to pass upon that question. Then he determined that Cronin was elected. He had no power to pass upon that question; and if he had the power it would have been a false decision, a decision in the face of all the authorities in this country. So far as Louisiana is concerned, the returning board had the power to do what it did do. It may have made a wrong decision—I will not discuss that now—but it had the power to pass upon the votes that were given and determine whether they were legal or illegal. The governor of Oregon had no such power. The returning board of Louisiana exercised power given to it by the law. The governor of Oregon exercised power not given to him, not given to anybody, so far as the counting of the votes is concerned.

My friend from Missouri is happy because he has found an honest man. He has been going about with a lantern these many years and has at last found an honest man in Oregon, in the governor of Oregon, who had the boldness and the manliness and the courage to stand up in the face of his malignant enemies and assume to be the returning board of Oregon when he was not. He assumed the power to decide that Watts was ineligible when he had no such power, and he assumed the further power to decide that Cronin was elected when in point of fact he was not elected. The governor of Oregon had the will to do that in the face of his malignant enemies, and therefore he has excited the admiration of my distinguished friend from Missouri.

But I simply rose for the purpose of correcting what I regard to be a misstatement on the part of my friend, that returning boards are late inventions. They exist in every country, and always have, where officers are elected by the people. There must be somebody to count the votes, and whoever is commissioned to count the votes under the law of the State constitutes the returning board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SPENCER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BOGY. Is that the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD?]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to have it reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "alleged" in the first line of the pending amendment, and insert:

That the governor of the State of Oregon has issued a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin as one of the electors of said State instead of issuing such certificate to one J. W. Watts, alleging that the said Watts was ineligible to the said office of elector on November 7, 1876, the time of said election:

Mr. BOGY. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Chair. I think the vote is first on the resolution before even an amendment to the preamble or anything concerning the preamble is voted upon. I, therefore, suggest that the vote had better be taken first upon the resolution, and then an amendment to the preamble and a vote on the preamble itself will be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be adopted if there be no objection. The question then will be on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BOGY. As I am informed there is no objection to the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. So I supposed; that passes as a matter of course; and then the preamble will be in order, and the Senator can move his amendment to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is usual to take the vote on the main question first and on the preamble afterward, and that course will be adopted if there be no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to inquire into the eligibility of said J. W. Watts, and investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors, and report the same to the Senate; and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not particular about the yeas and nays on that. There is perhaps no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon withdraws his call for the yeas and nays. Does the Senator from Missouri insist upon the yeas and nays?

Mr. BOGY. My request was with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, not this proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is an amendment to the preamble, and not to the resolution.

Mr. BOGY. I do not call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to the original resolution, an amendment, the Chair understands, of the committee. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it an amendment to the resolution or to the preamble?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment of the committee to the resolution, not an amendment to the preamble.

Mr. DAVIS. Did the Clerk read the resolution as it will read if amended or as introduced by the Senator from Oregon? Let the Clerk report it again as it will read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution as introduced by Mr. MITCHELL is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors, their action as electors and pretended electors, and the action of the governor and secretary of state in respect to them, and report the same to the Senate; and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

The amendment reported to that resolution is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is hereby instructed to inquire into the eligibility of said J. W. Watts, and investigate the facts attending the appointment of said electors and pretended electors and report the same to the Senate, and for this purpose may employ a stenographer, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

Mr. BOGY. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. EATON. Is the question upon the amendment of the Senator from Delaware?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the amendment of the Senator from Delaware is an amendment to the preamble. The question is now on the amendment of the committee to the resolution.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not care at this late hour of the discussion to consume very much of the time of the Senate. In my judgment this discussion has been premature. I have no objection to the passage of the main resolution; I have no objection that a committee of this body should take into consideration the action which has been had in Oregon. I regret that the chairman of that committee has prejudged the case. I regret, and I think I have a right to regret, any discussion at this period upon a question that is as grave as this, the result of which may or may not determine who shall fill the chair of the Executive of this country. The question is a grave one. Every patriotic man, every honest man in this broad land, no matter what his politics may be, will unite with me in saying that the question is a grave one. It ought then to be approached in a proper and a grave manner. There should be no taunts, no flings. But my honorable friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in discussing this subject the other day was betrayed into the use of language which, in my judgment, he will regret on cool reflection. In a vehement and violent, not to say insolent manner, he dared democratic Senators upon this floor to speak their views upon this subject. He dared a Senator upon this floor; he dared the democratic Senators upon this floor. Let me tell that Senator that the democratic Senators upon this floor are to be dared by nobody, by no man, by no set of men. The democratic Senators on this floor, like the people of this land, dare to do right; they dare to do what they think is just. I belong to the democratic organization, and always have belonged to it. I believe in the purity of its principles, and always have. In that opinion and belief I know I am honest. Its principles may be wrong, but my convictions are honest; and I shall dare here and elsewhere to assert those principles and carry them to their just conclusion.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EATON. With great pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Connecticut dare, in justice to himself as a Senator, in justice to his own reputation as a lawyer, to state upon the floor to-day that in his judgment Mr. Cronin was elected one of the presidential electors in Oregon and that the governor of that State did right in issuing a certificate to him?

Mr. EATON. Before I get through, unless I forget myself, the honorable Senator from Oregon will find that he had no need to put that question. I say, belonging as I do to the democratic organization, I dare to assert that I am an independent member of that organization, that I do not belong to anybody connected with that organization, that I would not count a vote wrong to elect the man who, in my judgment, has been triumphantly elected by the American people. That I dare say. Returning boards or no returning boards, governors of States or scoundrels elsewhere, I do not desire the advantage of any wrong in this canvass of votes by the American Senate: there will be none so far as I am concerned. I was taught in a different legal school from the governor of Oregon. I do not stand here to say anything as a lawyer that I cannot defend as a lawyer. My teaching has been different from the teaching of the governor of Oregon. I believe the law in the United States to be as I shall state it, with the exception of a few of the States. I say, however, right here, in opposition to the opinion of my distinguished friend from Indiana, that his State has gone on all-fours with the governor of Oregon, and so have other decisions in the United States; but my opinion as a lawyer, my teaching as a lawyer has been that the man who did not get a majority of the votes the people did not want. This was very well illustrated once in my own State by a chief-justice where two lawyers were candidates for the office of grand juror, a prosecuting office in my State and worth in some of the cities considerable money, three or four thousand dollars a year. Two young lawyers were candidates. One received a thousand votes more than the other; but it turned out that he was not a citizen of Connecticut; he was a native of the State, a former resident of the town where he then resided, but he had removed to New York, become a citizen of New York and had not been long enough back in the State of Connecticut to have regained his citizenship there; and therefore by the constitution and laws of Connecticut he could not be elected to the office. The chief-justice had some peculiarities about him. The mandamus came at last and he said to the young gentleman who contested, whose first name was Jonathan, "Jonathan, there may be some doubt whether the good people of New Haven desire a grand juror at all; but there is one thing pretty clear, they did not want you; if they had, they would have given you a couple of thousand more votes than they did." He went further, of course, and argued the case; but he settled the law so far as Connecticut was concerned, and I believe he settled it properly with that remark.

Now, sir, apply it to Oregon. Watts was one of the republican candidates for elector and Watts received more pieces of paper with his name upon them than Cronin. I use the expression understandingly. They were not votes; they were as blank pieces of paper. I will call them, for convenience as I pass along, "votes," but before I get through I will endeavor to show that in no sense are they or were they votes. Watts received a thousand more votes than Cronin. Therefore, if Watts was an eligible candidate, Watts was elected; if he was not an eligible candidate he was not elected. The governor of Oregon, on what he regards as good authority and good law, has said that Watts was an ineligible man, an ineligible candidate, and that the man having the next number of votes was elected to the office for which Watts was a candidate. That is the opinion of the governor of Oregon, in my judgment an honest man, in my judgment a truthful man, in my judgment resting his case upon what he regards, and has a right to regard, as good law. I differ with him. I do not attack his integrity; I throw no stone upon the pile to commemorate his infamous act, as it has been called, for I do not so regard it. He acted as he believed was honest. He acted upon the opinion of able counsel, as well as upon his own opinion. In my judgment he was wrong as to Cronin; but in no sense could he have certified the election of Watts by any law either of Oregon or of the United States. Watts was not elected. Watts was ineligible, and every vote cast for Watts was a blank. Taking that view of the case—and I have no doubt that the governor of Oregon did take that view of the case—he saw his way clear to give Cronin the certificate of election because Cronin did have votes, acknowledged votes; he was an eligible candidate; and therefore every vote thrown for him was a proper, legal vote thrown for a proper candidate. That there is no doubt about, I apprehend, in the mind of the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I want to suggest to my friend from Connecticut that the law of Oregon did not require the governor to certify that Watts was elected, but it required him to certify who got the highest number of votes; and that was a thing he could do whether Watts was eligible or not. That was a question he was not to pass upon; but the law of Oregon required him to certify who had the highest number of votes.

Mr. EATON. The law of Oregon, with all due deference to the opinion of my distinguished friend, required no such thing. I know the words; I have read them and heard them read. By a strict construction of the law of Oregon, I beg leave to say to my friend from Indiana the certificate of the election of Cronin is right and proper. The other man got no votes; he could not get any; he was inelectible, ineligible, and every vote thrown for him was a blank piece of paper, not to be counted at all. It was not a vote. A vote is the evidence of the will of the individual holding in his hand a paper to be cast for an eligible candidate for any given office. That is a vote. But, as was well said on this floor by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] would a piece of paper cast for Her Britannic Majesty Queen Victoria have been a vote, a vote to be counted? It is perfectly absurd. The very statement of the case shows its absurdity. And yet, sir, calling these pieces of paper votes, according to the theory of the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Oregon, a piece of paper with the name of Queen Victoria must have been counted and returned, and gravely returned, by the exec-ntive of Oregon to the Congress of the United States. Now let me read:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

I read from article 2, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States. This man Watts was a postmaster, holding an office of more or less trust and of more or less profit under the United States. He was ineligible. A vote for him, in the opinion of every court that I know of, every supreme court of any State within this Union—a vote for him, in the opinion of the Queen's Bench, was void, a blank, a nullity. In other words, it was not a vote. It could not legally be counted. Reading that clause of the Constitution of the United States, the question with regard to the law of Oregon, if there be a law of Oregon in contradistinction to this law of the United States, falls to the ground; it is not to be considered; it is worthless; it is void.

If I am right in my conclusions that a pretended piece of paper cast for an ineligible candidate is not a vote, a legal, proper vote, then there is an end to this case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Connecticut understand that the office of a presidential elector is a State office and one that would be governed, so far as eligibility is concerned, by inhibitions in the State constitution as well as in the Federal Constitution?

Mr. EATON. Which question is it my friend wants me to answer? If he will ask one at a time, I will answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want both.

Mr. EATON. Ask one at a time.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the judgment of the Senator, is the office of presidential elector a State office?

Mr. EATON. It is.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well. That being conceded, would a provision in the constitution of the State to the effect that certain things should render a person ineligible to office under that constitution apply to the office of presidential elector?

Mr. EATON. What would? I do not quite get my friend's idea.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would a provision in the constitution of the State of Oregon to the effect that "no person who may hereafter be a collector or holder of public money shall be eligible to any office of trust or profit until he shall have accounted for and paid over, according to law, all sums for which he may be liable," apply to the office of presidential elector?

Mr. EATON. I do not know that I am on the stand to answer a question that has no reference whatever to the matter now under discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon of the Senator. If he will allow me, it has direct reference, in my judgment.

Mr. EATON. I do not think so. I cannot be driven from my point to answer a question that in my judgment has no reference to the matter in issue. If it be said that Mr. Cronin owes a debt, has public moneys in his hand which he has not paid over to the State of Oregon, then there might come a question here whether he should be a candidate for elector.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me now—I do not wish to disturb him——

Mr. EATON. It does not disturb me at all except that I do not want to stand very long on the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do desire to get the opinion of the Senator upon this very point. Suppose in the case of Watts, for instance, he had not been a postmaster, but suppose the suggestion had been made to Governor Grover that he, Watts, had been a collector or holder of public money and that he had not accounted for and paid over all that money according to law, what I want to get from the Senator is whether Governor Grover's duty would have been to have tried that question and passed upon his eligibility.

Mr. EATON. Well, Mr. President, I do not choose to answer that question. My friend shakes his head and I hope it is not for the same reason that somebody else once shook his head. My friend shakes his head. I beg leave to say to him that my opinion here rests upon the organic law of the whole country, the Constitution of the United States, and not the constitution of Oregon, and questions are not to be put to me to divert me from my line of thought. By the Constitution of the United States if Grover had given a certificate in favor of this man Watts he would have violated the Constitution of the United States and done what he knew to be wrong, absolutely wrong, and against the supreme law of the land. The great trouble with my friend is that he finds fault with the governor of his State for following the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all.

Mr. EATON. He did follow it. He did not give a certificate to an ineligible candidate, to a man who could not be voted for under the Constitution of the United States, and therefore he did right in refusing to give a certificate to Watts. With regard to his giving a certificate to Cronin I do not go into that question any further than I have. I have expressed my opinion upon the law of that case. Therefore I need only say that in my judgment he should have certified the election of two men and only two men as electors for Oregon. Acting in my place as a member of this body I could not vote, and, had I the power to vote, as I claim that I have the power, I would not vote to place in the chief executive chair of the United States the candidate of the democratic party upon the vote of the democratic elector, so called, of Oregon. That is my opinion, and unhesitatingly I announce my opinion on that subject. Perhaps hereafter I may have an opportunity to call on my friend from Oregon to exercise his judgment upon a case of far greater wrong than the case of Oregon. I ought to say here what I believe I have a right to say, taking the very stand-point which the honorable Senator from Oregon occupies, that it strikes me his political stomach is disordered by a very small matter when it can stand the garlic of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina.

I do not propose to discuss at length any other question than the one properly before the Senate, and I am sorry to be compelled to say a word upon that subject, and I should not have said it except that it was proper that the people whom I in part represent on this floor should know exactly where I stand upon the question of Oregon. Under no circumstances, in my judgment, will either of the Senators from the State of Connecticut vote to claim the election of Mr. Tilden upon the Oregon elector. I want no election covered over as that would be with wrong; in my judgment, not fraud, but wrong, erroneous judgment in the executive officer of Oregon; and I shall approach the discussion of other questions, when we arrive at them, in the same feeling; and ask my friends on the other side of this Chamber to stand with me to maintain the purity of the elective franchise throughout the whole country.

So, Mr. President, while I could vote very readily for the naked resolution which is here, I cannot vote for the preamble which has been put upon that resolution. It implies wrong, not error, but absolute fraud, in the executive of the State of Oregon. From all that I have heard of that gentleman, he is a man of high character, stainless reputation; and I have yet to learn that an error in law, if it be an error, should stamp his or any other man's name with infamy. Nobody has ventured to say a word against the reputation of this executive of one of the States of the Union, a man the Legislature of whose State has recently elected him to a seat on this floor, the peer of the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Oregon. In advance, before the taking of his seat, is he to be called a fraud in his own State? A man guilty of fraudulent acts in his own State? Mr. President, no such resolution as that ought to be voted for.

The honorable Senator from Indiana said that this was a trick—I use his own word—a trick to control the election of a President of the United States. If the law of Indiana, if the law of two other States in this Union, (but perhaps not to the full extent,) if the law of Judge Hoadly of Cincinnati, if the law of the governor of Oregon, is right—and it is right if the reading of the statute by the honorable Senator from Indiana is right—where does the "trick" come in? Look at the position of the case. First, pretended ballots cast for an ineligible candidate are not votes; they are as blank pieces of paper, and the casting of them is absolutely and utterly void. Then the second position is, taking the statute of Oregon as read by the Senator from Oregon, that that person having the greatest number of votes must be certified up by the governor of Oregon. If that be so, then that elector is Cronin, for the other man was not a candidate and had no votes. Those cast for him were all blank pieces of paper. Taking that view of the case—and I am bound to suppose that the governor of Oregon did take that view of the law; I must suppose it—then the position he assumed is not only defensible but justifiable. My friend from Indiana is not always right. His legal opinion, my legal opinion, is not always right. It may possibly fall out that the governor of Oregon is right in this matter and the honorable Senator from Indiana and myself both wrong, and therefore, in my judgment, the word "trick" is a stigma that should not be used. It leaves a mark upon this man which should not be made. He acted defensibly; as he believed, justly. If he acted justly in his own judgment, then there is no trick.

Mr. President, there is such an intimate connection between this subject and the one that was up here the other day that I desire to read a letter which I have before me. I am very glad that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is in his seat. He has placed before us his opinion in regard to certain matters in the State of Louisiana; now I desire to read this letter:

DE SOTO PARISH, LOUISIANA,
December 12, 1876.

Hon. J. MADISON WELLS,
President Louisiana Returning Board:

I have learned that your honorable body has returned me as elected to the lower house of the Legislature from the parish of De Soto. Permit me to return my thanks for the honor conferred, but at the same time permit me to say that I am unwilling to accept the position. I am a republican from the firm conviction that the principles of that party are best for the whole country.

It is also true that I was the regular nominee of the party in the parish of De Soto for the Legislature and did more than any member of the party in that parish to organize it and advance its interests; but, sir, knowing as I do that I was fairly defeated at the polls, no intimidation or fraud having been practiced by the opposite party at any precinct in the parish, so far as I have been able to ascertain after a thorough investigation, my self-respect will not permit me to accept the position. I hope you will pardon me for taking a step that at first glance may be thought calculated to cast some discredit upon the party with which I have allied myself; but I am a planter, not a politician; all my interests are here; but, sir, I cannot believe the good of the State or of the national republican party can be promoted by returning as elected a candidate so clearly defeated as myself.

In fact I am convinced that very much of the disturbance that has prevailed throughout the State for several years past is justly attributable to the fact that in many parishes men not elected by the people have been returned elected and maintained in office by the power of government. I must believe that you and your associates have been grossly deceived as to the manner in which the late canvass and election in De Soto was conducted and as to the result.

Very respectfully,

JOHN J. LONG.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that one witness like this man weighs down a thousand affidavits. Here is a candidate of the republican party in the parish of De Soto who says himself that he was fairly defeated; says himself that there was no intimidation or, to use a common expression which has recently obtained, no bull-dozing in the parish of De Soto; and yet the honorable Senator from Ohio comes with affidavits, as I understand, saying that there was intimidation in that very parish. I desire to place this letter on the record for what it is worth. The time will come, by and by, when we come to the discussion of the question regarding Louisiana, when this letter will be valuable testimony. It is testimony behind which the republican party ought not to go.

Mr. President, let me be indulged in a word or two more with regard to the importance of the matters now before us, and then I shall have done with an unpleasant duty. I did not desire to say a word at this time on this subject. As I said in the outset the questions now pending before the Congress of the United States are of the most grave character. I assume that every member of this Congress, of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, desires fair action. I think I can speak for every one of my friends on this side of the Chamber: no unfair action is desired by us. No matter where it strikes, no matter whether Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes shall be declared to be the honestly elected President of the United States, so that it is fair and honest, there will be no trouble here. If Mr. Hayes is honestly elected President of the United States, he will be inaugurated the President of the United States. If not, not. There can be no intimidation in this question; nobody can be intimidated in a country like ours. When every man requires justice and justice only, the question of intimidation cannot come before us. Crazy men may talk; partisan newspapers on the one side or the other may rave; but the representatives of the people, who have in their hands the well-being of forty-five millions, cannot afford to do wrong.

The President of the United States is quoted by this man and that man, by this paper and that paper, as saying this thing and that thing, as that he will deliver over his office to the man who is inaugurated. He has nothing to do with it. The man who is elected and inaugurated takes the position of President of the United States without any action at the hands of the present Executive. He becomes—such is our law, and God be thanked that it is so; may it always be so—he becomes a private citizen of the United States, and is no more than any other of the citizens of the United States. It will not do to talk about enforcing anything. The good sense of the people of this country, operating on and passing through their representatives, will see to it that justice is done here. What right have I to suppose that my friend the Senator from Massachusetts, or my friend the Senator from New York, or my friend the Senator from Rhode Island has any desire to do what is wrong because they belong to another political organization than myself? God forbid that I should entertain any such opinion.

It has been said that the President of the Senate has stated that he, the President of the Senate, has the entire control of the votes and that no votes can be counted except by himself. Sir, I do not believe the President of the Senate has ever said any such thing. The President of the Senate has no more right to count the votes than one of the pages. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] smiles. I say the President of the Senate has no more right to count the votes for President than one of the pages. The Constitution devolves a certain duty upon the President of the Senate, but nothing else. The Constitution of the United States says that "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." By whom? If the convention that formed the Constitution of the United States had intended that the counting of the votes should be done by the President of the Senate, that convention would have so stated, in my judgment.

It has been said by partisan newspapers that the President of the Senate would be the president of the convention of the two Houses, and as president of the convention would hold supreme power. Sir, I desire to say another thing right here; it might as well be said now as at any other time; and that is that the President of the Senate is not the president of the joint convention unless he be appointed by that convention. Nowhere does the Constitution determine who shall be the president of the two Houses when they come together. I agree that by usage, by precedent, the President of the Senate has always been the presiding officer of the two Houses. I am not about to say that I would not prefer him to any other man for the presiding officer. What I do say is that the Constitution gives him no such place. He is simply the custodian of the votes, and as the custodian opens the votes. He is not by law or by rule or by constitution the president of the joint convention. I desired, sir, although this my close has nothing to do with the question of Oregon, to say just this much with regard to the power belonging to the presiding officer of this body.

I trust that every Senator, every member of the House of Representatives, appreciating to its fullest extent the gravity of the situation in which Congress is placed, will go into the critical examination of the votes with the same determination which I have, to do what is honest, just, and fair; and I believe that all will. I know my own feelings on that subject, and I have no right not to presume, on the contrary I am glad to believe, that my associates occupy the same plane, the same ground that I do, and that the scrutiny of votes which will be given by Congress on the 14th of February will be just and fair and honorable and right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, my attention was called before this debate to a letter purporting to be from Mr. Long as to his election as a member of the Legislature of Louisiana from De Soto Parish. I know nothing about the letter except that I saw it in the public prints. I do not know whether he was a candidate, but I presume that he was, and that he thinks he was not elected and surrenders all claim to the election. I am not informed that the board returned him elected. I have seen no statement of the return of the legislative ticket. I think the gentleman has probably leaped before he came to the stile. Probably no return has been made of his name; but whether there has been or not I do not know. I only know that I have before me the testimony as to De Soto Parish, which is printed on pages 545 to 548 of the volume sent to us by the President, and here are the depositions of sundry witnesses, among the rest one who is evidently a very intelligent man, J. M. Carter, who was examined and cross-examined by both parties. There are also some ex parte affidavits, but there are two or three witnesses who were examined and cross-examined whose testimony shows certainly irregularities at certain polls in that parish. The nature of these irregularities is pointed out in the testimony. The effect they had on the returning board I do not know. Whether they excluded any votes on account of them I do not know, nor is the Senator from Connecticut any better informed than I am. It is sufficient for me to say, however, that De Soto Parish is not one of the controverted parishes upon which the testimony was taken. The whole testimony in regard to De Soto Parish is confined to four or five pages and relates only to two or three wards in the parish. As to whether Mr. Long was elected or not, I do not know.

Mr. MORTON. Was the parish thrown out?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there was no parish thrown out.

Mr. BOGY. There were parishes thrown out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. How does the Senator know?

Mr. BOGY. It is so.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not know. There is the trouble. There is nothing in the testimony with regard to De Soto Parish except the few pages I have referred to; and I think on looking over the testimony it would justify the throwing out of certain polls, but on that question I am not prepared to pass an opinion because I do not know all the particulars and details.

This is all that it is necessary to say about De Soto. The parish of De Soto was not one of the parishes where intimidation was alleged, and proved as clearly as any historic fact, in my judgment, from the birth of Adam down to our existence at this moment. Therefore, it is a mere fly on the wheel and has nothing to do with this case.

I cannot fail to express my gratification at hearing some of the observations made by the Senator from Connecticut. He has told us that neither he nor his colleague from Connecticut nor the candidate of the democratic party for President desires the election of Mr. Tilden by trick or fraud, or, to use his own much more proper phrase, wrong. That, certainly, ought to be the feeling of all of us; and it seems to me that if the whole American people and both Houses of Congress and every one who has anything to do with this business shall act upon that rule, the strict rule of right, we shall have no difficulty in ascertaining who has been elected President of the United States.

So far as the Oregon case is concerned, I said the other day that it did not rise to the dignity of a dispute, nor in my judgment does it, because it is perfectly apparent that three living persons, citizens of Oregon, received a majority of the votes at the election in Oregon. They were all republicans. It was alleged that one of them was ineligible for the office because he held a post-office yielding him the enormous profit of $248 in the course of a year, I believe. Is that it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Two hundred and sixty-eight dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two hundred and sixty-eight dollars in the course of the year. Therefore he was technically ineligible. I might stop here and dispute with Senators as to whether this is an "office of trust or profit," which I believe is the language of the Constitution; whether it is within the meaning of the language of the Constitution an office of trust or profit, and therefore whether he was ineligible. But that is not material. It is certain that he resigned, that though he received a majority of the votes he resigned and did not attempt to hold the office under that election but was afterward elected to fill a vacancy after his disability had been removed, so that the will of the people of Oregon, honestly, fairly expressed, would entitle Governor Hayes to the three votes of the State of Oregon, because his electors confessedly received a majority of the votes cast at the election in Oregon. That ought to settle that matter.

Mr. BOGY. How about Florida?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to apply the same rule to Florida. But there is another provision of the Constitution which is mandatory, and which I am surprised that my friends on the other side of the House do not seem to give force and effect to. What is that? The Constitution provides that these electors shall be elected in the mode pointed out by the laws of the State. It is purely an election by the respective States, to be governed by their laws. I am very certain that if Governor Hayes should become satisfied, or if I should become satisfied, so far as my action may bear on this question—I do not know that it will—that Governor Hayes did not receive the honest vote of a State or that he did not have a fair majority of the votes legally cast he would not desire the electoral vote of any of the disputed States. If it should be clear that in South Carolina, or Florida, or Louisiana, Governor Hayes did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at the election in either of those States, I would not have him—God forbid that he should—accept the office of President of the United States with such a conviction upon his conscience. Any man who would do it would be dishonored before men and before God. But the trouble is that in the investigation of these matters we must not only pursue the forms but the spirit of the law. In the case of Louisiana the law has been in existence, more or less precisely as it is now, for six years, which authorizes certain officers named by the senate of the State to canvass the returns. It gives them full and plenary powers—powers that are not given except in about half a dozen States of the Union. It is admitted that that board was legally organized. Although it is claimed that it failed to fill a vacancy, yet I have heard no lawyer insist that that defeated the legality of the board or destroyed the power of the board. This board, then, legally created by the laws of Louisiana, have acted on these returns. They have acted upon them openly in the light of day. That is conceded on all hands.

Mr. BOGY. I do not admit that they acted openly in the light of day, nor do I admit as a member of this body that that board was legally organized. I think it was not legally organized. My friend has a right to state his views, but he must not state them as those of all of us.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend is the only doubting Thomas I have heard in the Senate. I will speak for all that I think are right. That that was a legally constituted board has been disputed, it seems, by the Senator from Missouri. It is provided for by the law of Louisiana in so many words. It exercised functions under a law somewhat similar in character in 1872, and under precisely the same law in 1874. A committee of the House of Representatives, having power to do it in the investigation of the election of a member of the House and also in the investigation of the Louisiana election generally, held that they made a mistake of law. They construed it that they had power to act in excluding votes when there was no formal complaint or protest made by the officers who held the election. The committee set aside the action of the board to that extent for the purpose of founding a compromise in Louisiana, but at the same time they certified to the honorable character and general good conduct of the board, and the only difference was in regard to a legal opinion, and the chairman of that committee the other day in debate in the other House, to which we may refer as part of the history of the times, repeated again, and I am sorry I have not now his language before me, that that committee never did arraign the returning board for personal misconduct or arraign its legality. They acknowledged its legality. It was a conceded fact.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to interrupt him for the moment? I hold in my hand a report, and he will allow me to read just that one section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am referring to what Mr. HOAR said in the House of Representatives the other day.

Mr. WHYTE. But I understood the Senator to refer to the report made by Messrs. FOSTER, Phelps, Potter, and Marshall.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, I did not. That is not the report of the committee. That was the report of a subcommittee. If my friend will allow me to go on, I will ask the Secretary to get me the debate in the House, I think on Friday last, containing the statement of Mr. HOAR in regard to that report and hand it to me; I have not got it before me.

I repeat that the report to which the Senator from Maryland now refers is the report of a subcommittee, which was afterward reconsidered and re-examined by the whole committee that went there and made a full and formal report, and that is the report; and of that report Mr. HOAR, the chairman of the committee, made his statement the other day, in which he showed that the legality of that board was not questioned nor the personal conduct of the members of the board, but that the committee did hold that they had no power to exclude the returns in certain cases where certain formal protests had not been presented.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to say that my colleague in the House, [Mr. FRYE,] another member of that committee, in the public press has made the precise statement that Mr. HOAR made in the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, and I want read, so that Senators may see exactly how the fact stands, the statement made by Mr. HOAR so often commented upon. Senators have sometimes confounded a report made by a subcommittee of this committee with the report made by the committee. That subcommittee reported back to the whole committee and the whole committee, acting on the report of the subcommittee, proceeded, in pursuance of the previous instructions of the House, to examine the whole subject-matter as a full committee. It is the report made by the whole committee that I referred to, and in that report Mr. HOAR says the legality of the board was not contested, was not called in question; it was only its construction of the law; and Mr. HOAR very properly says that if everybody should be arraigned as a rascal because he fell into an erroneous construction of his own power, all of us perhaps, might be arraigned in the same way.

I say, then, that the board of returning officers in Louisiana were a legal, valid tribunal under the laws of the State of Louisiana to pass on these returns, and they have done it. Now, so far as public opinion is concerned, so far as good faith is concerned, it is perfectly right and proper for Senators and editors and everybody else to show that this board acted wrongfully or acted corruptly. I do not deny that fraud, open, palpable fraud would defeat any act whatever. Even the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States might possibly in certain cases be impeached for fraud, gross, palpable fraud. But here is a board, with legal powers, legally constituted, in the exercise of a duty imposed by the State. Here is the Constitution of the United States which makes the laws of the State conclusive and gives to the State Legislature full authority to prescribe the mode and manner of choosing electors. This board then acted on these returns. The result is sent to us under the certificate of the governor and secretary of state of the State of Louisiana.

Now I ask Senators how they can open up this case except as an appeal to public opinion, to show that the board acted wrongfully and corruptly? I say for one that if it should appear that any of the boards in the disputed States have been wrongly, corruptly, abusing and grossly misusing their powers even under the State authority to make a false return, I for one would not desire to see Governor Hayes or anybody else have the benefit of that return. There is no question of controversy about that. The real difficulty we have to deal with is behind that; how we shall get at these facts; what power the House has; what power the Senate has; what power Congress may have in enacting a law prescribing the mode and manner in which the count shall be made. These are questions that gentlemen may debate with reason and moderation, and I, for one, am prepared to consider them whenever they are presented by any one. When you come to the questions presented by the action of these returning boards, their powers, &c., as to whether they acted right in De Soto, whether instead of throwing out 19 votes they ought to have thrown out 20 or only 10, I say you are traveling beyond the record. Unless your allegations go to impeach the honesty and good faith and integrity of the board, its action is final and conclusive upon us.

I will now ask the Secretary to read what Mr. HOAR said:

The CHIEF CLERK. This is in the RECORD of December 16:

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose of course to engage in any discussion of this general question. I should not have risen at all but for the allusion in the document just read to a report signed by myself, the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] and the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who sits near me.

It is difficult to believe that the gentlemen whose names are signed to that paper, some of whom I have known and respected, could have known its contents, or, if they knew its contents, could have known the contents of the document which they undertake to cite.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that the speaker was commenting on the paper which was read here the other day, the report of Mr. Trumbull and others.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

That paper grossly perverts and misstates to the American people the document which it assumes to quote. It picks out one or two sentences, mixing them up with sentences from another document coming from another quarter; and thus it is made to appear that that committee said something or came to some conclusion in derogation of the honesty or honor of the returning board of the State of Louisiana. Nothing can be found in that report imputing any fault to that board, except this: We declare that the returning board, following the precedents set them by their democratic predecessors in the same office in 1872, erred in one particular in a construction of their legal powers, which construction was clearly necessary to remedy a defect in the law. We held that where the people of a particular parish had been set upon by armed bands, prevented from making a canvass, prevented from having discussion, prevented from going to the polls and casting their votes, still, unless a particular officer certified to those facts, although he might have been intimidated himself or might have been a part of the conspiracy, there was no law in the State of Louisiana to remove that difficulty.

Mr. ELLIS. No government, the gentleman means.

Mr. HOAR. No law in the State of Louisiana to remove that difficulty. There should have been such a law. Does anybody deny it? Is it an imputation of dishonor upon the gentlemen of the returning board that, following the democratic precedent, they gave such a construction to the law in that particular as removed that clear defect?

Now as to the question in regard to the absence of government, we did not say that Governor Kellogg was not lawfully elected governor of that State. On the contrary, we declared that we believed he was so elected; and this House so recognized him on our recommendation. We said that the democratic party in 1872, conspiring with Governor Warmoth, had destroyed the legal evidence of Governor Kellogg's election, and that therefore we were obliged to resort to the less satisfactory methods which we had followed for ascertaining the real will of that people. It is true that we pointed out to the American people the grave danger that now exists. We said that it was a serious thing that the true evidence of the election of a State government should be destroyed, as it had been by the democrats of Louisiana, thus leaving us to grope in the dark in order to arrive at the true will of the people. We said, further, that the democratic party of the North if they would but cause it to be understood that they would have no political affiliation with men who would commit murder for political purposes, could end this whole trouble in a month.

Now the question to-day is, what is the true will of the majority of the legal voters of the State of Louisiana? It is not a question of paper, of parchment, or of statute. Is it true, gentlemen on the other side of the House, that there are counties and parishes in the United States where men cannot cast their votes because they are assailed with murder and assassination? Let us know that. If it be not true, we shall all rejoice; and if the ascertainment that it is not true results in the election of a democratic President, we shall all rejoice that the stigma is removed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of Judge HOAR has the appearance of judicial fairness, and no doubt is the deliberate conviction of his own mind; and I assent to every word there stated. Now what does he show in regard to this returning board? Two years ago they fell into the same mistake of law, in the opinion of the committee, that the democratic board had done two years previous to that.

Mr. BOGY. And this year.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I understand not. The Senator will find that that is a mistake. There was no protest whatever, no complaint made by the legal officers of the election two years ago. The question as to whether it should be done within twenty-four hours after the election did not come up at all. There was no complaint made, no written formal complaint made under the law of Louisiana, and therefore the law was not complied with. It was held four years ago by the democratic board that, under the last clause of section 26 of the election law of Louisiana, any candidate might make that complaint and the board might pass upon the complaint. Our House committee, however, held them to a more rigid construction of the law, but they say they did not call in question their integrity or their conduct, because they had simply fallen into an erroneous construction of a law following a democratic board that preceded them only two years before.

Now, when Senators come here and admit that Governor Grover has participated in what is called a wrong, because that was the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut, when it is conceded that Governor Grover and the secretary of state of Oregon participated in what is called a wrong, although, as the Senator from Connecticut says, without wrong intent but simply through a mistake of the law: when he is so kind and generous and merciful to the governor of Oregon and the secretary of state of Oregon, why can he not have a little kindness and mercy and generosity to the returning officers of Louisiana? Is there anything in the conduct of these two classes of men that should make one rule to apply to one and another to another? Here is a returning board, acting under the law of Louisiana, pursuing what they regard as their plain duty, a board legally organized, acting for the third time under, I believe, the same law and having made their decision in plain conformity to the law of Louisiana; they are to be denounced, and the newspapers contended and still insist that the committee of the House have denounced these men in some unmeasured language. I felt bound to have read to the Senate this statement of Judge HOAR that the committee of the House never did make such a denunciation, that the original charge was made by a subcommittee of the House committee, and that that report of the subcommittee was afterward revised and reconsidered and re-examined by the whole committee and it was upon the final action of that committee that the people of Louisiana, through their leading members of both political parties, finally settled the dispute in regard to Kellogg and the State Legislature, the house being given by the decision of the committee to the democrats and Kellogg recognized as the governor of Louisiana.

Now the gentlemen who made that decision declare that they never said one word against the integrity or conduct of the board, but simply pointed out an error of law into which they had fallen and corrected that error. That is all they did. Yet they are denounced, and the newspapers, notwithstanding the manifest statements that had been made of fairness in the conduct of their proceedings, still insist on arraigning this board as men guilty of some great wrong and fraud. There is no evidence of that kind. While my friend from Missouri will not yield anything or confess to anything, he must remember that the committee appointed by himself and other gentlemen did say that they were present at all these proceedings except the sessions when they took up the final returns and made their decisions; that is, every paper was opened in their presence, every document bearing on the case, every scrap of testimony was filed in their presence and in the presence of others; and so far as any one could see the proceedings of the board were open, honest, fair, and their rules were reasonable. It is a very remarkable thing, too, that the very rule that they prescribed as to the admission of persons to see this count has been adopted by the committees of the House and of the Senate, by the committee of the Senate certainly, sent to Louisiana. They allowed four gentlemen on each side representing the respective parties, they allowed the representatives of the press to report their proceedings, and a few others besides to be present, and excluded the great mass of the crowd outside. They adopted the very rule of publicity of our own Senate committee composed of honored members of this body of both political parties. That committee adopted the very same rule in conducting the proceedings that this board, so often arraigned, did in their examination of the returns of Louisiana.

Sir, I wish to consider the acts of all these officers with charity and kindness. When I gave my opinion the other day that the case in Oregon in my judgment would not in the minds of the people of the United States stand as a question of dispute, I said nothing about Governor Grover, nothing of the officers who performed their duties as they thought conscientiously. I would not arraign those officers; but I appeal to the same charity for the returning board of Louisiana and for these other returning boards that you ask us to extend to Governor Grover and the secretary of state of Oregon, who participated in what my friend from Connecticut calls a wrong. If gentlemen could show that these boards acted corruptly, and thus struck at the foundation of their whole proceedings, they might make a different case for public opinion to act upon. I say for one that, rather than see Governor Hayes elected by a fraudulent return, an illegal return, a return that violates honor and justice, I would see him anywhere else than in the office of President of the United States, and I know I but speak his sentiments when I say that, if you convince him that any of these boards have acted corruptly and fraudulently and dishonestly, he will make no claim to the office of President of the United States, and I know I can speak for thousands of friends of his who believe he is fairly and honestly elected that they will make no such claim.

It is in the absence of all such proof, in the absence of all such allegation, when we produce you the regular return of these officers of the State governments, that you at once attack the officers of the State governments and attack the laws of the States; and the laws creating these returning boards are denounced. Why, sir, the Constitution declares that the States shall prescribe the mode and manner of doing this thing; and are you, who have always been the defenders of the rights of the States, you who insist that Congress is trampling down the rights of the States—are you the men to denounce the exercise of a plain, legal duty by the officers of a State government? That is the attitude in which you are placed. No, no, Mr. President. All these questions I believe will be decided by the general acquiescence of the American people. As the case now stands, it does seem to me that the returns from the three disputed States, Louisiana among them, are on exactly the same footing and foundation of law and honor as the returns from the State of New York or Ohio. The case of Oregon has already been sufficiently disposed of, and it is not necessary for me to comment upon it. There is no occasion in the examination of this question for any undue excitement. If the question of fraud in the action of a returning board should come up as a matter of public opinion, then probably it would be time enough to discuss the evidence; but in the case of Louisiana, although I would not be able to show and could not from the nature of the testimony be able to show that the action of the returning board as to a parish officer or as to a member of the Legislature or as to local matters was correct, I think I can show upon this testimony, by every rule of evidence that I have ever read in a law book or known to exist in morals, that judging by the evidence the vote of Louisiana ought fairly to be counted for Governor Hayes.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I have decided to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD;] but in casting that vote I do not desire to be understood as placing myself in accord with the logic, the argument, or the conclusion of my honorable friend the Senator from Missouri, [Mr BOGY.] I must confess that while listening to his argument I felt he had lost sight of the usual fairness with which he deals with subjects on this floor.

I am not ready to cast any vote, or to make any remark on the floor of this Chamber which would cause anybody to believe that I for one moment can estimate a man as an honest, patriotic governor of a State who will by an act of his allow the credentials of a whole electoral college to be placed in the hands of one man, that one man being his political friend and the remainder of the members of that college being his political opponents. No man can convince me, upon the showing which this Senate has, and which the whole country has of this case, that Governor Grover can be regarded as an upright, high-toned governor, because no honest man will pursue a course of that kind. But I do hold that in introducing resolutions of inquiry in this body preambles which assert that there is guilt, when a committee is charged with the duty of discovering whether there is guilt or not, are undignified, to say the least, and ought not to accompany such resolutions.

I am glad to be quite in accord with my friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] in many of the expressions of opinion he has made to us to-day, and it is my earnest hope that I may perform the duty now resting on us with a conscientious regard for the law, the facts, and the justice of the case. But, Mr. President, in view of the information of which we are possessed, information derived from the public prints, from the correspondents of newspapers, from the statements of Governor Grover himself, and from the statements of both sets of electors, I do not see how any Senator can come to the conclusion that in any event that man Governor Grover can be an honest and fair man; and if these statements of the case are shown to the American people to coincide with the facts of the case, it is my honest belief that his name will stand before the country as the synonym for trickster.

Mr. BOGY. I will ask my friend from Rhode Island a question. I think he finds fault with the governor of Oregon because he handed, as he says, the certificate of the election of electors to Mr. Cronin. That is the point of the objection the Senator makes.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is the point I make. He handed all the certificates to his political friend. That political friend, by the present showing of the case, declined to hand the certificates belonging to the republican electors to them except upon certain conditions.

Mr. BOGY. What Mr. Cronin did I do not know; but the electors were in session, and the certificates could only be handed to one man—and they were handed to Mr. Cronin. Now, my friend from Rhode Island very well knows that there must have been a contest between those men growing out of the peculiar condition of things, which contest the governor of Oregon had nothing to do with; and he could not hand these certificates to all the men at once.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then I should say that the governor of Oregon ought to have disclaimed the act of the man Cronin and say he was no party to it; that it was his distinct intention that each elector should have his certificate.

Mr. BOGY. The time has not come to disclaim that fact. There has been no charge made, except by the Senator.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The time has come, it seems, for him to publish a long statement to the country to justify himself. It would not have taken him a half a minute to add just that one sentence: "I disclaim the action of Mr. Cronin in this respect; it was my distinct and honest intention that the republican electors should have their certificates."

Mr. BOGY. The point made is simply this, that the governor of Oregon gave the certificate to one man. He could do nothing more. They were in session. It had to be given to one. It could not be given to all. Whatever sharp practice might have been perpetrated by those men afterward is neither here nor there. But if I am not interrupting my friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] I should like to say a few words in answer to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

He makes pretty much the same statement to-day that was made the other day. He sustains the action of the returning board of Louisiana. First he says that it is not denied by a single Senator on the democratic side of this Chamber that the returning board of Louisiana was legal and legally organized. I say that he has not heard one single democratic Senator admit that fact; on the contrary, it has been denied, because the law provides for five members of the returning board, and these men, in violation of that law, as the Senator from Ohio well knows, went on and assumed to discharge their duty when there were but four members of the board; thus destroying all its legality. Powers were conferred on five men, who must be by law members of different political organizations. It contained but four men, being all republicans, and they would not appoint the fifth man, who by the law had to be a democrat; and hence that board was not legally organized. The Senator is mistaken when he puts into our mouths the words that we admit the legality of that board. He is furthermore mistaken when he says that that board proceeded in accordance with the law. It never did. It did now as it did in 1874, as it did in 1872; and its action in 1872 is claimed as a precedent; and he calls that a democratic precedent. Why, sir, there has not been a democratic organization of that kind in Louisiana for years. It was a republican organization. At the head of that board in 1872 stood Lynch. Do you call Lynch a democrat? Backed by whom? By Warmoth. Who ever called Warmoth a democrat? He may for a while have confederated with the democracy—to their shame I say it—but he never was a democrat; and it is not correct to say that there was a democratic returning board in Louisiana in 1872.

And, sir, when the Senator from Ohio says that the committee appointed by the House of Representatives did not censure the doings of that board, I assert that he is mistaken, and I hope that my friend from Maryland will, before we close the debate, read the report which he has on his table before him. I say that Mr. Phelps and Mr. FOSTER, two republicans, did make a report, and it became the majority report, and is so printed, and that report said that these men had acted illegally.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does my friend say to the statement made by Mr. HOAR in the House?

Mr. BOGY. I am only sorry that Mr. HOAR could so far have forgotten what he had done himself before as to make a statement of that kind, because it is not correct, it is not sustained by the record, it is not sustained by the report, which I hope my friend from Maryland will soon read. It is an after-thought. He does not sustain himself by his own history. A report was made by Mr. FOSTER and Mr. Phelps characterizing this board as men not worthy, to say the least, and all united in saying that they had done that which the law did not authorize them to do. They claim that they were authorized by precedent which the Senator from Ohio calls the precedent of a democratic board in 1872. Does not the Senator know well that there was no democratic board in Louisiana in 1872?

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, I know exactly the reverse, and I tell the Senator that he has fallen into an error. There were two boards in 1872. The first board organized under this very law was the democratic board. That was the board which returned McEnery. The other was the Lynch board, and the democratic board was the De Feriet board. That was the first board organized under the act under which this very board is now acting; and my friend is mistaken, therefore, when he says that there was not a democratic board. In 1872 the first returning officers under this law were a democratic board. The republican board or Lynch board was acting under the law of 1870. That first democratic board established the rule in regard to this matter of protests that was followed by the present board two years afterward.

Mr. BOGY. The De Feriet board, which he calls the democratic board, was not a democratic board, although there was a kind of combination in Louisiana which had combined with the democracy; but it was a mixed board. Let that be as it may, the precedent that is spoken of here is the precedent established by the Lynch board, which was a republican board; and what was that? They permitted testimony to be received by that board in violation of the law, because the law is positive. The Senator is mistaken again when he says it was not thought to be of any importance before that the return of intimidation, or fraud, or bad conduct in the different parishes should be made within twenty-four hours. It has always been considered a most essential thing, and the law is positive in two sections that, if anything of this kind transpires on the day of election or on the day of registration, it shall be the duty of the commissioner and of the supervisor of registration or election to make that return within twenty-four hours; and that has always been considered the law and has always been violated by the returning board of Louisiana, and the committee of the House stigmatized it in very mild terms as something illegal; it was more than illegal; it was a fraud. That same thing was done there a short time ago when the Senator was there. Few, if any, returns of intimidation had been made from any parishes in Louisiana. Perhaps there was none at all; but if there were any, they were few indeed, and none had yet been made when I was in New Orleans, weeks and weeks after the election, and we inquired into it. They were made even days after the Senator was in New Orleans. Made how? Affidavits taken in the city of New Orleans from the scum, and the sewers, and the sidewalks, and faubourgs of that city by men who could not sign their names, and, of course, could not read what was written for them; and, on the affidavits of such men, a majority of 8,000 votes in the State has been overturned and an apparent majority of near 4,000 votes given on the other side. If that is fair, I have yet to learn what fairness is. Thus this board did that in violation of law which had been done by the board in 1874, and which the board in 1874 felt justified in doing because the board in 1872 had done it; but the committee of the House said it was wrong; and yet when that report of the committee was known to these men, known to the Senator from Ohio, this present board pursued the same course in violation of law.

Now, sir, if a return of that kind, made in violation of law, can elect a President of the United States, why should not the return of the governor of Oregon be as good and also able to elect a President of the United States? The Senator's effort has been from the beginning of this contest to sustain the action of this board, its purity, its character; to show that it has pursued the law; but it has violated the law in every respect, first, in not organizing with five men, as the law required; second, in receiving affidavits of intimidation and bad conduct on the day of election, in violation of the law. And yet the Senator says they have acted in exact accordance with the law and with great propriety; that these are immaculate men, good men, pure men, the peers of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decision is entitled to as much respect as the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States! The Senator is making a great effort to sustain the bull-dozing of the State of Louisiana. I do not think he will succeed.

I am happy to have heard him make the declaration to-day—and as I believe him to be an honorable man I think it will be carried out—that if he ever can be satisfied that the conduct of that board has not been fair and honest and legal, he will himself not sustain the acts of the board. If he cannot be satisfied of that fact when the time comes, then he would not be satisfied if a man should come from the dead or speak with the voice of an angel, because the fact will be made so plain that the blind can see it; no man on earth but will admit the action of the returning board of Louisiana has not been what it should be.

I am compelled to say these things, Mr. President, and it is the position I assumed from the beginning and the Senator is only repeating what he said when this discussion took place in his effort to sustain the board. I say that the board has not placed itself before the country in a way to be entitled to credit. I have no personal feelings of animosity to its members—none at all. I know Mr. Wells but very slightly. But the question arises above that. It is a fact that they are not men of standing at home. They have been held up before this country as unworthy and some of them are men of no attainment, of no character, of no reputation, none at all at home; and the idea of these men returning the vote of that State and being sustained in the plausible, gentle, insinuating way of the Senator from Ohio is what I cannot myself submit to. I say the board was illegally organized and no democrat has ever admitted that the board was legally organized; but it proceeded illegally. A committee composed of republicans in the House heretofore sent down there say so and the law says so; and all their proceedings are now illegal because no certificates of intimidation or protests were made within twenty-four hours and forwarded with the returns in compliance with the law.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the motion made by the Senator from Maine is put, I desire to make a statement with reference to a conference report which is expected every moment from the House. I received information a few moments ago that the conference report on the bill appropriating money for the expenses of the committees going south would be sent here within ten or fifteen minutes. It is very important that it should be agreed to to-day, as the committees on both sides are anxious it should be. I hope the Senate will not adjourn until we act upon that conference report.

Mr. ALLISON. We are only going into executive session.

Mr. WITHERS. Can we not proceed to the consideration of executive business with the understanding that when the doors are re-opened the conference report shall be acted upon?

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senate will not adjourn in executive session but return from executive session to consider the report, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 20, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENECA INDIANS.

Mr. SEELYE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a substitute (H. R. No. 4257) for the bill (H. R. No. 258) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875, and moved that the same be recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee for the District of Columbia joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply blankets to the Reform School of the District of Columbia.

The joint resolution was read.

It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to deliver, for the use of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, two hundred Army blankets from any in his custody belonging to the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is there a report accompanying that joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is none at the desk.

No objection was made to the consideration of the joint resolution, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HARTZELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be allowed a special clerk for the remainder of the session, to be appointed by the chairman thereof, and to receive the same compensation as clerks of regular committees.

RICHARD H. FOUTS.

Mr. WOODWORTH. At the close of last session, when I was absent by leave of the House, the bill (H. R. No. 2807) for the relief of Richard H. Fouts was reported upon adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs and laid upon the table. I ask unanimous consent that it now be placed upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BANNING. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege.

No objection was made.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments on a matter personal to myself.

It is the first time that I have obtruded anything upon its attention of a merely personal character.

A newspaper of this city has been made the vehicle for circulating false and calumnious charges against me. Most of these refer to business transactions which took place over thirty years ago, and which were then refuted, and retracted by their authors. Those which purport to have occurred since that time have been proven equally without foundation.

These facts are known or should have been known to the parties who are now reviving them, doubtless for the purpose of deterring me from the performance of my public duties at this juncture. I have risen, therefore, to say that each and every allegation affecting my personal integrity in these publications are void of foundation, that they were originally created for purposes of black-mail, that they were promptly met by me then, and completely refuted, without yielding to the money demands which had been made on me, and have been revived since by political and personal enemies for objects obvious to every one.

I ask the Clerk to read a letter sent to me this morning, without solicitation, from Mr. Spofford, the highly esteemed Librarian of Congress, which properly characterizes the nature of these assaults, and the source from which they now emanate.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1876.

DEAR SIR: My attention has just been called to a highly scurrilous assault upon you in this morning's National Republican of this city. My purpose in writing this note is to pronounce the assertion prefixed to that article, that one of the Library attendants told the writer that the pamphlet referred to had been "stolen from the Library," a falsehood in every particular. Mr. Morris, the assistant who informed the Republican reporter of the absence of the pamphlet, informs me that the interview as printed is a base and willful fabrication. Its author, I understand, is one A. M. Soteldo, lately of the New York Free Lance, a journal devoted chiefly to libels.

Very respectfully, A. R. SPOFFORD,
Hon. FERNANDO WOOD Librarian of Congress.

I repeat that every charge, of every nature or character, which the paper referred to has made is, like the one referred to by Mr. Spofford, equally without foundation.

I thank the House for granting me this indulgence. I promise not to trouble it again about any matter so purely personal.

CONGRATULATION FROM IRELAND.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that he has information that there is in this city a gentleman who bears to the people of this country from the Irish nation congratulations to our people on this centennial year.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of preparing for consideration of the House such expression as may be deemed appropriate in recognition of this friendly act of the people of Ireland, I submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it has been announced to this House by the Speaker that Mr. John O'Conner Power, M. P., has been deputed to present to the people of the United States congratulations of the Irish nation on the centenary of American Independence: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the subject of his mission be referred for consideration to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report what action should in their opinion be taken in the premises.

Mr. SWANN. I rise for the purpose of seconding the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, and I will state for the information of the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has already had this subject under consideration and will report upon it as soon as possible, in accordance with the instructions contained in the resolution. We have and will accord him all the courtesies in the power of the committee of which I am chairman.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if it would not be better to say the "Irish people" rather than "nation?"

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as the term "nation" used in its general sense is not inappropriate in this connection, I think it may very properly be retained.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am in favor of the resolution in any shape.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a sense in which the term "nation" is very properly applied to the "Irish people."

I ask the previous question upon adopting the preamble and resolution.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOAR. What is the national authority deputed to this gentleman?

Mr. HOLMAN. It comes from that portion of the Irish people who now reside within the limits of Ireland. He is their representative, deputed by them by general expression as a people.

Mr. HOAR. In what mode is the deputation made or authenticated?

Mr. HOLMAN. By general popular expression, as we are informed. That is one of the subjects which will properly be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is the expression of a people, not of organized government, as the country is informed.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Indiana by this resolution makes the House allege as a fact that this gentlemen has been deputed by the Irish nation. Now it is proper, if the House is to assert that fact, that it should know it. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who offered the resolution, I understand does not know that fact. My question to him is, What is the national authority? And suppose the Irish nation should say next week that they did not depute this gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. The technical point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is clear enough.

Mr. BANNING. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question has been seconded. The question is upon ordering the main question.

Mr. HOAR. I would say to the gentleman that perhaps it would be better to use the words "alleged to be deputed."

Mr. HOLMAN. There seems to be no question of the fact. The term "nation" used in this preamble is manifestly as used synonymous with the term "people."

Mr. HOAR. Why not say so?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the resolution will be adopted in its present form. There is no impropriety or ambiguity in the terms used. The whole subject will go before the Committee on Foreign Affairs for consideration.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT CAMERON MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-one minutes before one o'clock, and the House will resume the consideration of the unfinished business at the expiration of the morning hour of yesterday.

The unfinished business was the bill (H. R. No. 4258) reported from the Committee on Military Affairs as a substitute for House bill No. 2248 to provide for the payment for certain improvements on lands now embraced in the military reservation of Fort Cameron, in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. TERRY. There is no report accompanying the bill. A point of order was made on this bill yesterday, but I understand that the gentleman who made the point of order is willing to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agreed with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who made the point of order, that in case he was not in his seat this morning the point of order should be regarded as pending against the bill.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman was in his seat a moment ago.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. The gentleman intimated to me, after I had given him an explanation of the character of the bill, that he would withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is now present, and the Chair would call his attention to the fact that on yesterday he made a point of order against the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to hear some explanation from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] who reported this bill before I give up the right to make a point of order against it. I will reserve my right to object until I hear the explanation.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let the title of the bill be read, so that we may understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of War to appoint a commission, composed of three Army officers, whose duty it shall be to investigate the claim of W. J. Allred and Alonzo A. Noon for improvements made upon lands now embraced in the military reservation at Fort Cameron, in the Territory of Utah, and to estimate and report upon the value of said improvements. In making such estimate of value of improvements, the board of officers may take into consideration the proceedings of a board of officers who assembled at Fort Cameron February 15, 1875, and such other evidence as may be brought before them, and report also upon the title of the claimants to the land embraced in the reservation.

Mr. TERRY. Prior to the location of this reservation, these claimants allege that they were bona fide settlers upon this land and had made improvements upon it. After the reservation was located there, the post commander appointed a commission to estimate the value of these improvements in order that the claimants might come before Congress and obtain payment for the same. It is conceded that the post commander had no right to appoint a commission for this purpose. The original bill provided for paying these claimants for these improvements, but the Committee on Military Affairs have deemed it right to report, not a bill in favor of paying these claimants, but a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a commission of Army officers to go upon the reservation and ascertain first whether these claimants had any title, and, if so, what compensation should be paid to them for their improvement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a single suggestion upon the point of order which I understand is still pending.

The SPEAKER. It is held in abeyance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that it has been uniformly held that even the reference of a claim to the Court of Claims comes within the rule. Although that claim may not again come before the House for action, it might result in making an appropriation or requiring one to be made. So in the case of creating an office; the bill creating or establishing the office makes no appropriation for it, but it probably would involve an appropriation of money, and on that account it has been held that bills of that class are subject to the point of order. I would call attention to Rule 112, on page 191 of the rules of the House, which is as follows:

> All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

The term made use of in this rule has resulted in the class of decisions to which I refer. This is a proceeding touching the appropriation of money; that is to say, it may involve such an appropriation and probably will; and when a measure so nearly involves an appropriation of money as would the reference of a bill to the Court of Claims or the creation of an office, then of course the subject must be referred under the rule to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Indiana will see that when this report is made by this board and a bill based on the report is brought into the House, the point may then be made against the bill; but I do not think it necessary to insist on the point of order now.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] who made the point of order does not insist upon it, the Chair understands that the bill is before the House free from the operation of the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. Is it in order, then, to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest, then, to the gentleman having charge of the bill that after the clause providing for the reception by the board of such evidence as may be brought before them, the words "or may be obtained by them" should be added. As I understood the bill from the reading, it provides for the consideration of two items of evidence. First, the report of the former commission; secondly, the evidence that may be brought before them. I think the board ought also to have the power to obtain evidence, which seems to be excluded by the present language of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. I have no objection to adding any language which will make the bill more effective.

Mr. KASSON. I move then to insert after the words "such other evidence as may be brought before them" the words "or may be obtained by them.

Mr. TERRY. There is no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the Chair will regard the amendment as part of the text of the bill. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be read as amended. As I understand, there is no allegation that these parties had any right to settle on these lands. I do not understand that they were pre-emptors or homesteaders.

The bill, as amended, was read.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. Mr. Speaker, at the time this fort or reservation was located at Beaver these parties were settlers on this land, cultivating it. They had taken the steps necessary to secure a Government title to it. They had been occupying the land for some time. Colonel Sheridan, under the directions of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, went down and located Fort Cameron at Beaver, in Utah Territory. After the location of the fort at this point a board of officers was empowered to sit and value the improvements that had been made by the original settlers, who had been dispossessed of the occupancy of the land for the purpose of a military reservation. That board of officers did sit and value the land; they received testimony, and the proceedings were submitted to the War Department.

When these parties called at the War Department to have their claims settled, they were told that there were no funds with which to settle the claims; and they were referred to Congress. A bill was introduced in this House early last session to furnish the funds necessary to pay these claimants; but, upon examination of the case by the Committee on Military Affairs, it was found that there was a defect in this proceeding; that the board of officers had sat without authority from the commander of the Department of the Platte. Therefore the Committee on Military Affairs deemed it proper to present this bill, authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a new board, who shall sit and take into consideration the evidence that was presented to the previous board.

Mr. HOLMAN. The principal question here is as to the nature of the claim of these parties to this land, whether they occupied it under the homestead or pre-emption laws, or by some other mode. If they were mere squatters on this land, without any authority, the Government of course would not be responsible for the value of any improvements which they may have made. Now, if they had taken up this land under the homestead or pre-emption law, how could their claim be divested by the action of the military authorities?

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. It is well known that for twenty-five years settlers in Utah Territory had no title to their lands except that of squatters. I am not informed whether this land had been surveyed or not. But if they had no title to the land, if they were without title and did not enter the land when they had opportunity, that matter can of course be taken into consideration by this board. My impression, however, is that these two persons had taken every step that they could take under the circumstances to secure themselves a title to the land.

Mr. TERRY. To meet the very difficulty which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suggests, this substitute provides that this board of officers shall inquire into the title of these claimants.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had supposed that this information could be obtained very readily from the General Land Office, thus avoiding perhaps the expenditure of a very large sum of money.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT H. FLAVELL.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1688) for the relief of Robert H. Flavell, sergeant Company F, Seventh Missouri.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Robert H. Flavell, late sergeant Company F, of the Seventh Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, the sum of $99.80 for extra pay for services from April 5, 1863, to May 7, 1863, and commutation for loss of clothing and personal effects by sinking of steamer Tigress while running the blockades of Vicksburgh, Warrenton, and Grand Gulf, the latter amounting to $82.80; such payment to be in full satisfaction of all demands by said Flavell for said matters and to be made out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "$98.80," and in lieu thereof insert "$40.30."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. TERRY also, from the same committee, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following joint resolution, bills, petitions, and memorials, and that the same be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to:

A bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of certain settlers on the Camp Lowell military reservation, Territory of Arizona;

A bill (H. R. No. 2554) to extend the time within which the Court of Claims may hear and determine the claims of the officers and soldiers of the late war, growing out of services therein;

The petition of William Mosely, late a hospital steward, United States Army, requesting that the cause of his discharge from the service (before expiration of term of service) may be investigated; and Petition of William Geisel, late second lieutenant Company C, Sixth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

TRADING ESTABLISHMENTS AT MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. BANNING, from the same committee, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2564) to prevent monopoly and exorbitant charges in trade establishments at military posts and to secure good order at the same, and that the same be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to.

ARMY PROPERTY AND MONEY DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BANNING also, from the same committee, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2530) to re-organize the property and money departments of the Army, and for purposes connected therewith, and that the same be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to.

SERVICES OF MONTANA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BANNING also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3995) to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of Montana Volunteers for the suppression of Indian hostilities; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio and to the House that in case of adverse action by a committee on any matter referred to them it is the rule that there should be a report. That is the only way in which Congress is protected against acting favorably at some future time on a bill which had previously been reported upon adversely.

The motion of Mr. BANNING was agreed to.

CAPTAIN EDWARD S. MEYER.

Mr. BANNING. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report that the committee have had under consideration the message from the President of the United States assigning reasons for not approving the bill (H. R. No. 36) to restore Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army. This bill passed the House, passed the Senate, went to the President, and was vetoed. The committee concur in the veto message of the President, and instruct me to report back the bill with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The message of the President was as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

For the reasons stated in the accompanying communications submitted to me by the Secretary of War, I have the honor to return herewith, without my approval, House bill No. 36, entitled "An act to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 14, 1876.

[H. R. 36.—44th Congress, 1st session.]

In the Senate of the United States, July 14, 1876.—Read twice and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to restore to the active list of the Army the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer, of the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry, who was retired on the 24th day of August, 1872, for reason of physical disability, resulting from wounds received at the battle of Chancellorsville, from which he has since sufficiently recovered to return to active duty, and to assign him to any vacancy in his grade now existing, or which may hereafter occur, in any of the cavalry regiments of the Army: Provided, That the time that he has been on the retired list not be counted in his service in giving promotion.

MILTON SAYLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives pro tempore.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, August 4, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return House bill 36, "to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army," and beg to invite your attention to the inclosed report of the Adjutant-General of this date, stating objections to the approval of the bill.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
August 4, 1876.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

Edward S. Meyer served as a private in the Fourth Ohio Volunteers (three months) from May 4, 1861, to August 18, 1861. He again enlisted as private Nineteenth Ohio Volunteers, September 10, 1861, was promoted first lieutenant November 1, 1861, and resigned September 27, 1862. He was commissioned captain One hundred and seventh Ohio Volunteers November 11, 1862; was wounded at Chancellorsville, Virginia, May 2, 1863, and discharged for physical disability January 1, 1865. He was again mustered into service February 8, 1865, as major Fifth United States Veteran Volunteers, (Hancock's Corps,) and mustered out March 20, 1866. Was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general of volunteers March 13, 1865.

He was appointed captain Thirty-fifth United States Infantry July 28, 1866; became unassigned August 12, 1869; assigned to Nineteenth Infantry August 5, 1870; and transferred to Ninth Cavalry January 1, 1871. Retired August 24, 1872.

July 8, 1869, Captain Meyer applied for retirement on account of wounds received at Chancellorsville May 2, 1863, by which he was incapacitated for active service. No action was then had on the request, pending action by Congress reducing the Army.

October 6, 1869, he asked to be placed on waiting orders, being unfit for duty, and no possibility of improvement without going North. He was accordingly relieved from duty and ordered home to await orders.

December 18, 1869, he called on the Secretary of War and asked to be assigned to duty.

January 4, 1870, he again applied to be assigned to duty with some regiment on the frontier, stating that his wound had healed, &c., and asking to withdraw his previous request for retirement; this was accompanied by a similar request from his father, Mr. S. Meyer, of Ohio.

July 29, 1870, he applied the third time to withdraw application for retirement and to be assigned to duty. On January 1, 1871, in accordance with his repeated requests to be assigned to duty, he was assigned to the Ninth Cavalry, serving in Texas. He joined the regiment, and on March 4, 1872, he renewed his former request to be ordered before a retiring board, stating that he found his injuries would not allow him to remain on duty on the frontier; that his disability was constantly increasing, &c. The medical director of the department approved the request, and added that Captain Meyer's wounds certainly unfitted him for service on the frontier.

April 13, 1872, Senator SHERMAN joined in requesting retirement of Captain Meyer. He was ordered before the retiring board, and on August 20, 1872, was examined. The board found Captain Meyer incapacitated for active service, and that said incapacity results from a gun shot wound received in his lower jaw at the battle of Chancellorsville, Virginia, May 3, 1863, when captain in One hundred and seventh Ohio Volunteers. He was retired in accordance with the finding.

March 21 and December 6, 1873, Captain Meyer asked restoration to active service and re-appointment as a captain of cavalry, which application was disapproved by the General of the Army.

Pending the action on the bill before Congress, no reports were called for, as to the official facts of record in the War Department, and no evidence has been filed in this office showing that he has sufficiently recovered.

The absence of such evidence, and the fact that after one assignment to active duty he has failed to be sufficiently recovered, are submitted as objections why the ill should not be approved.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. BANNING. The recommendation of the committee is that the bill and message do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that under the Constitution the yeas and nays must be called. The language of the Constitution is very clear on this point. It says:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively.

Under that provision of the Constitution the Chair rules that in all cases of action by the House upon a veto message the yeas and nays must be taken.

Mr. BANNING. I was about to suggest to the Chair, but the suggestion I suppose is too late now, that this has not been the practice. I call the Speaker's attention to Barclay's Digest, page 226, which says:

A veto message and bill may be referred, or the message alone and the bill may be laid on the table.

In addition to this, I find in the Journal of this House of August 10, 1841, page 1256, the House having under consideration a veto message—

A motion was made by Mr. James Cooper that the bill do lie on the table.

Mr. William Cost Johnson objected to this motion as not in order, for that, according to the Constitution, the House must proceed to the reconsideration of said bill. The Speaker decided the motion to lay on the table was in order. From this decision Mr. William Cost Johnson appealed to the House, which appeal was, on motion of Mr. Fillmore, ordered to lie on the table, and the opinion of the Speaker stands. The question was then put that the bill do lie on the table, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 73.

Mr. HOAR. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to suggest whether, as the yeas and nays must be clearly called upon the question under the ruling of the Chair, it is not better to put the question, "Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President?"

It is true that the motion to lay on the table is under our usages a method of final disposition of such a measure. Still, it is not strictly and technically a disposition of the measure. It is technically the laying of a measure on the table from which it might be again taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the proper way to proceed is that suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts. There is only one instance, or perhaps two, in which it has been varied from——

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will pardon me, as this is a very important point——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman as far as he wishes to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire simply to suggest as a reason for the ruling of the Chair that the yeas and nays must be taken, that the object of this provision of the Constitution was the protection of the people against the possible encroachment of the executive power. Therefore Congress having once passed a bill, if the President returned it, in order that the House or Senate might not change their minds as to what the good of the people require in consequence of any undue pressure from the executive department, it was ordained for the protection of the people that the names of the persons voting should be on the Journal, in order that they might do it under the responsibility of the public knowledge of the vote. That, of course, applies to every mode in which the bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair concludes from the statement and suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he coincides with the Chair in his ruling?

Mr. HOAR. Entirely.

The SPEAKER. The question would first be on the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. HOAR. Is not the true question, "Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objection of the President?"

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. This is the statement in the Digest:

The main question in the consideration of a vetoed bill is, "Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill?"

The SPEAKER. The practice as recorded in the Digest—

The main question in the consideration of a vetoed bill is, "Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill"— would seem to make necessary the question which the Chair has presented to the House, "Will the House reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed?"

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair will allow me, I would suggest that it is the first reconsideration brought about by returning the bill to the House that that refers to. The President returned the bill here; it is reconsidered by the House; and the question that is then arrived at is, "Will the House agree to pass the bill?"

The SPEAKER. That has not been the practice, but it clearly saves a motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me that the veto power of the President is misnamed when it is called a veto power. The only power the President has is to move a reconsideration. He moves a reconsideration of the bill; and when he sends it back here it is reconsidered and the motion is, "Shall the bill now pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President?" We do not need ourselves to vote to reconsider. The President has the power to put the bill in the attitude of one under reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The words prescribed in the Manual are these: "Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the reconsideration now pending.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there is a little difference between the word "reconsideration" used in the Constitution and the word "reconsideration" as used in our practice. I think in the Constitution it will bear the construction, Will the House after further consideration agree to pass the bill? and I think the proper question would be, Will the House after reconsideration agree to pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the motion: Will the House agree to pass the bill notwithstanding the veto of the President?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is it.

The SPEAKER. Upon this motion the yeas and nays must be taken.

Mr. BANNING. I merely wish to understand how the question stands. The instructions of the committee was that I should make the motion which I have made, to lay the bill upon the table. That motion was made in accordance with the Manual, and I understand that it is ruled out by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules it out.

Mr. BANNING. Then I ask for a vote upon the question Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the veto of the President? so that the matter may be disposed of.

Mr HOLMAN. What is the motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the report from the committee was substantially that the bill should not pass, or, in other words, that the veto of the President should be sustained.

The question will now be taken, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the veto of the President?

The question was taken; and there were—yea 1, nays 197, not voting 91; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Terry—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

INVESTIGATING-COMMITTEES' TELEGRAMS.

Mr. LYNDE. I rise to a question of privilege. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit a report with accompanying resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and upon which I ask the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of Committee on the Judiciary on House resolution of the 16th of December instant.

Your committee have had under consideration the communication presented to the House by the Speaker, from Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the select committee appointed to investigate certain matters relating to the late election in Louisiana, and respectfully report that the communication fails to inform the House of the names of the person or persons who refuse to produce papers and telegrams, or the circumstances under which the refusal was made. The House has the power to compel the production of books, papers, and telegrams mentioned in the investigation before the committee, and any witness who shall refuse to produce such papers or telegrams when required should be brought to the bar of the House to answer a violation of the privilege of the House.

The committee report the following resolutions and recommend their adoption:

Resolved, That whenever any witness duly subpœnaed to appear before any committee of investigation of the House refuses to appear before such committee, or refuses to produce any books, papers, or telegrams in his possession or under his control, when required, the committee shall report the name of such witness and the facts and circumstances relating to such refusal, for the action of the House.

Resolved, That whenever a witness has been duly subpœnaed to appear before a committee of this House, any person who shall tamper with such witness in regard to the evidence to be given by him before the committee, or who shall interfere with or prevent the attendance of such witness before the committee to give testimony, or interfere with or prevent or endeavor to intimidate or prevent such witness from producing any books, papers, or telegrams required by the committee, on the facts being reported to the House such person shall be brought to the bar of the House to answer for a breach of the privileges of the House.

Mr. McCRARY. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] desires to offer an amendment on behalf of the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] as having the floor, and he has demanded the previous question.

Mr. McCRARY. I think the Chair misunderstood the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is certain that he did not misunderstand the gentleman; he heard him call the previous question.

Mr. LYNDE. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] to present his amendment.

Mr. HURD. In behalf of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to offer a resolution in addition to those reported by the majority.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] admit this amendment for information or for action?

Mr. LYNDE. For action.

Mr. KNOTT. Permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. Should the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] be agreed to, will it be then in order for me to offer a report for the substitute as amendment?

The SPEAKER. Should the call for the previous question be sustained, that would cut off any further amendment.

Mr. LYNDE. I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] is in the form of an additional resolution.

Mr. HURD. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the subpœnas issued by House committees commanding telegrams, books, papers, and other documents to be produced should describe them with such convenient particularity as may be, in order that they may be made capable of identification; and in cases where telegrams are ordered to be produced they should be described by reference to the names of the parties sending and receiving the same, the general subject-matter of their contents, and the date as near as may be of their transmission; but the committees charged with the inquiry shall not be required to make such description when, after having determined that they have reasonable ground to believe that telegrams are material to such inquiry, they shall be ignorant of the parties to such telegrams, of their contents and dates; but any description which will enable such telegrams to be identified shall be deemed sufficient.

Mr. LYNDE. I now call the previous question on the resolutions reported from the committee and the additional resolution submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

Mr. KNOTT. Would it be in order to move a substitute for the original resolutions and amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is sustained it will cut off further amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] be read.

Mr. LYNDE. I will yield to allow the substitute to be read for information.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there is nothing in the law rendering a communication transmitted by telegraph any more privileged than a communication made orally or in any other manner whatever; that this House has the power through its subpœna, under the hand and seal of its Speaker, to require any person to appear before any committee to which it has given authority to examine witnesses and send for persons and papers, and bring with him such books or papers, whether the papers be telegraphic messages or others, for the inspection of such committee, as such committee may deem necessary to the investigation with which such committee may have been charged; and that such committees may order and direct any witness who may be brought before it to produce to the committee any book or paper, whether such paper be a telegraphic dispatch or other, which may appear to be in his possession or under his control, which said committee may deem necessary to the investigation with which it may have been charged; and that any person upon whom such subpœna shall have been served, who shall disobey the same, or having appeared as a witness shall disobey the order of such a committee to produce any book or paper which he shall have been ordered by such committee to produce, should be brought to the bar of the House upon a report of the facts by the committee to answer for a contempt of the authority of the House, and dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

Resolved, That any person who shall prevent, or attempt to prevent, any person who shall have been subpœnaed to appear before any committee of this House from so appearing or from testifying before said committee, or from producing any book or paper which such witness may have been required to produce, or prevent or attempt to prevent any such witness from speaking the truth before such committee, should, upon a report by the committee of all the facts, be brought to the bar of the House to answer for a contempt, and dealt with as the law under the facts may require.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the House in reference to the manner of voting upon these questions. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] as the Chair understands, has demanded the previous question upon the original resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] If the previous question shall be sustained it will prevent a vote upon the proposed substitute by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to demand a separate vote upon the two resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would so decide.

Mr. CONGER. Then I will ask for the vote upon those resolutions to be taken separately.

Mr. LYNDE. If it is in order I will ask that a vote may be taken upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is voted down by the House, then the gentleman from Kentucky will be recognized by the Chair to offer his substitute.

Mr. KNOTT. But suppose the previous question is withdrawn?

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] not to insist upon the previous question at present, but to allow some debate within reasonable limits.

Mr. KNOTT. The question I ask is this: If my friend from Wisconsin should withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to allow me to submit a substitute for the resolutions of the report and the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, would it be in order for me to do so?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would entertain such a motion of course.

Mr. KNOTT. Then I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer my substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield first to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] for his amendment, and then to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] for his substitute; and then he demands the previous question.

Mr. LYNDE. I do.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes 114, noes 62.

Mr. KASSON. Before the main question is put, as several of us came in at the conclusion of the reading of these various propositions, I ask that they may be again read.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the several propositions will be again read.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before that is done I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Do I understand that, should the main question be ordered, we shall have the right to vote upon the resolutions introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. KNOTT?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. The first question will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. And if that be defeated, then upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. Whether it is defeated or not.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is all I want.

The resolutions reported by Mr. LYNDE were again read.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman who reported this proposition to the fact that it is not confined to committees authorized to send for persons and papers, but refers to any committee. I suggest whether a modification in that respect is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment offered by Mr. HURD was again read, and also the substitute proposed by Mr. KNOTT.

The question was then on ordering the main question.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman who reports the resolutions of the majority of the committee proposes to ask the consent of the House to modify those resolutions so as to apply to committees authorized to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded.

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman may modify his own resolution.

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask unanimous consent to modify the second resolution.

The SPEAKER. This is a report from a committee, and the Chair does not believe that it can be modified in this way.

Several MEMBERS. It can be by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Several MEMBERS. What is the modification?

Mr. LYNDE. I propose to modify by inserting after the word "committees" the words "authorized by the House to send for persons and papers."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. FRYE. This report having been made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] I understand he has an hour for debate upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded, and the question is now upon ordering the main question. If the main question should be ordered the floor will of course be under the control of the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he chooses to occupy it.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

Mr. HOAR. A very large number of members on both sides have suggested that it would be agreeable to them to have these several propositions printed and made a special order for to-morrow morning, if that can be done without delaying the matter any further, which nobody desires.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say that these propositions involve very grave questions of right and of law, and it would be a great convenience to every one to be permitted to see them in print before being required to vote upon them. For myself, upon hearing casually the reading of these papers, I scarcely feel able to decide how I ought to vote. I hope, therefore, that the consent now asked will be given.

The SPEAKER. There has been objection.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a question of order: whether the gentleman from Wisconsin is not now entitled to an hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already answered that question.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he will not take the hour to which he is entitled, in order that there may be some discussion of this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's question is in the nature of debate, which is not in order, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order: whether it would be in order to move the postponement of the consideration of this subject until to-morrow morning after the morning hour, so that these resolutions may meanwhile be printed.

Mr. SPRINGER. The effect of the previous question is to order this question to be now put.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; but I wish to suggest that the motion to postpone is not now in order. Rule 32 states the precedence of motions to be in the following order: "to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely." The House has already ordered the main question to be now put, and but two other motions can now be made, namely, to adjourn or to lay the subject under consideration on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the motion to postpone is not in order, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to ask the Chair to state, so it can be understood by the House, the precise attitude of the three different propositions before the House and what will be the effect of a vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the adoption of the amendment, as submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] to the original report of the committee.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If that shall be adopted, what then?

The SPEAKER. Then the question will come up on the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. LYNDE. I wish to explain to the House, if I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, under the rules, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LYNDE. I will first explain the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] to the original resolution reported by the committee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio prescribes the description which shall be used by the committee requiring the production of papers. It limits to some extent the authority of the committee in requiring the production of books or papers. It is true that the last clause of the gentleman's amendment provides that, where the committee do not know the name of the person who has sent the paper or the date of the communication, then they may give a general description, and the witness shall then produce the books or papers on that general description.

The objection which the majority of the committee had to the resolution as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio was that it left it in some measure within the discretion of the witness himself, as we thought, to determine whether the writ issued by the committee required the production of a paper or not. That question we regarded as a question for the committee in the first instance to decide and for the House finally to determine, and that the witness should have no right to decide or determine whether the papers sought for came within the requirements of the writ or not. To illustrate to the House, in Mr. Orton's communication to Mr. MORRISON he states in the first place that he is informed that employés of the telegraph company have been subpœnaed to bring before the committee certain communications between certain parties during certain months, specifying the months, and that the question was whether that was a proper form of subpœna and whether the committee was authorized to require the production of papers on so general a description. I think it was the opinion of a majority of the committee that it was specific enough, for it might not be within the power of the committee to designate any more specifically the papers they desired to have before them. Therefore the committee declined to adopt the resolution now presented to the House by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASSON. Now please state what will be the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. LYNDE. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky embraces perhaps what is already contained in the proposition presented by the committee, perhaps in a more direct form, but it does not conflict, as I understand, with the resolutions of the committee. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment reported by the minority of the committee relates to a subject-matter entirely different from that treated of by the resolutions of the majority of the committee and the substitute of its chairman. It relates to the form which shall be given to all subpœnas issued by the committees of this House for the purpose of requiring the production of telegrams and other papers. It recognizes the power of the House to issue subpœnas duces tecum requiring the production of papers. It recognizes the power of the House to punish for contempt of its authority those who have refused to produce papers in compliance with the terms of the writ. It recognizes likewise the power of the House to punish for contempt those who may have been guilty of tampering with witnesses who have been duly subpœnaed by the authority of the House. But it declares that no subpœnas shall issue for papers or telegrams unless there shall be contained in the subpœna such convenient description of the papers or telegrams sought as will enable persons upon whom the process may be served to identify them. It provides that in case of telegrams there shall be a description which shall give the names of the parties receiving and sending them, the general subject-matter of their contents, and as nearly as may be the date of their transmission. But in cases where the parties issuing the subpœnas may be ignorant of these facts the last provision of the resolution declares that such other description shall be deemed sufficient which enables the telegram to be identified.

This resolution is introduced to prevent a practice which has arisen in some places of issuing subpœnas which may be regarded as drag-net subpœnas, as they have been termed, which may call upon telegraph operators at any given point to bring before the committee all telegrams which may be in their possession, thus enabling the committee not merely to produce the evidence which relates to the particular matter of investigation, but also to bring before them the private telegrams of many other individuals, which may be irrelevant to the subject-matter of the inquiry.

The rule that this resolution proposes to adopt declares that, first, there shall be a finding on the part of the committee that certain telegrams are thought or supposed to be material, and then that the subpœna shall contain the description of such telegrams to which I have alluded. In making this recommendation it follows the well-established rule of courts of justice upon this subject; and while the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has suggested as an objection that it would leave to the witnesses themselves the power to determine the relevancy or materiality of the testimony, I will say in reply to the suggestion that such is the case in every duces tecum that is issued by the courts in the administration of justice. The designation, the description, should be such as to enable third parties to identify the telegram or the instrument desired. And I will say that in this recommendation the minority of the committee has followed the precedent which was set at the last session of Congress by the Judiciary Committee, when a subpœna was issued after full deliberation for the production of telegrams in what is known generally as the Blaine investigation.

Under these circumstances I submit that it is proper that there should be this limitation. Not a telegram which this committee can properly desire for the purpose of giving them information will be cut off from them. It only prevents this committee and other committees from issuing subpœnas for telegrams which have no connection with the subject-matter of the inquiry and no relevancy to it. I submit that, while it may be as stated in the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] that there is nothing in the law which makes any difference between telegrams and other communications between individuals, yet there is in the public mind a difference between them; and justly so, because the telegrams that are sent all over the country by thousands of men relate to all possible concerns of human life, relate to all possible questions of business; and nothing would be more unfair and unreasonable than that, without a great interest or necessity requiring it, these private telegrams should be brought before committees or courts for inspection.

Mr. LYNDE. As regards the clause of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] which provides that in case the committee do not know the names of parties who have sent communications or received communications, or the dates of the communications, then a more general description might be adopted. I would ask what possible benefit this amendment would effect? Suppose the writ is issued under that clause by a committee; can the witness be permitted, or can any one else be permitted to question whether the committee did know more particularly the paper they intended to reach by the process? Therefore it seems to me the last clause in the resolution will gain all the effect the gentleman seeks to gain by the first clause of his resolution.

But, Mr. Speaker, an investigation by the House in regard to the conduct of a public officer, or in regard to a question of great public interest, is entirely different in its character from a proceeding in a court of justice. The same rules of evidence do not apply to the two cases. While, if the investigation in the House relates to private interests, the rules of evidence as adopted by the courts of law prevail, they do not prevail in an inquisitorial investigation in regard to the conduct of public officers. And they should not prevail there; for, if they are held to prevail, then the efficiency of these investigations is entirely destroyed. In a private suit a party who is litigating is supposed to know all of the incidents, all of the papers, all of the communications that relate to his interest which he seeks to establish. But a committee of investigation of the House is appointed because the House does not know the facts which they seek to reach, and they should have authority to investigate so far as the public interest requires, and use every legal means for the purpose of promoting the public interest in that respect.

I would ask the attention of the House to a few orders which have been made in the British House of Commons. The British House of Commons on the 31st of January, 1809, entered the order which I shall read. Upon an investigation by the house, the committee of the house appointed to investigate the conduct of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, commander-in-chief, in regard to promotions, exchanges, and appointments to commissions in the army and staff of the army, used in raising levies for the army, the following was one of the orders:

Ordered, That a proper person from the banking-house of Messrs. Biddulph, Cocks & Ridge do attend the committee at the same time, and bring with him the banking-books of the said house for the month of July, 1805.

Here was an order of the House of Commons requiring the banking books to be produced in this investigation as to the official conduct of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, and requiring all the books for that month to be brought before the committee for their examination for the very purpose of ascertaining what they disclosed in regard to the conduct of the Duke of York.

On the 10th of February, 1809, in that same case, in that same investigation, the House of Commons entered the following order:

Ordered, That a proper person from the banking-house of Messrs. Marsh, Sibbild, Stracey, Fauntleroy & Stewart do attend the committee at the same time, and bring with them a list of the checks that affect Mrs. Clarke's account with the late Messrs. Birkett, silversmiths.

Mrs. Clarke was the person through whom these appointments were made, in consequence of her influence with His Royal Highness the Duke of York; and she was accustomed to receive money for her services with the Duke of York in bringing about these appointments. And it seems that Mrs. Clarke had purchased of Messrs. Birkett, silversmiths, silver plate; and upon that information coming to the House of Commons they entered the general order that some person from the banking-house should produce the banking-books containing a list of all the checks affecting Mrs. Clarke's account with the silversmiths.

On the 3d and 4th of February in the same year, in the same case, this order was entered:

Ordered, That a proper officer from the office of the commander-in-chief do forthwith attend the committee of the whole house who are appointed to investigate the conduct of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, the commander-in-chief, with regard to promotions, exchanges, and appointments to commissions in the army, and bring with him the books containing any application for purchase by subalterns within that period in which Captain Malin had his then commissions with him.

Now these orders, as it seems to me, are far more general than the orders which are complained of here. I will now call the attention of the House to Cushing's Parliamentary Law and Practice, section 968:

In regard to the course of inquiry a distinction must be made corresponding to that by which the different subjects of investigations are distinguished, namely, between inquisitorial proceedings and those which are judicial and relate to private individuals. In the former the utmost latitude both as to the form and the subject-matter of the questions proposed is allowed, the house being governed only by its own discretion—having reference to the public interest—in permitting or restraining the course of inquiry. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Wynne: "It was clear that the house was at liberty to exercise the fullest discretion upon every question which it was proposed to ask of any witness at their bar. In a court of justice the parties have the right to put any question they choose. The judge had only to determine whether it was a legal one, and if it was he could not refuse to admit it. In that house the case was widely different. There the questions were those of the whole body, though proposed by an individual member; there could be no obligation upon any one to consent to a question being put which he conceived to be irrelevant, immaterial, or in any way inexpedient for the public interests." In the course of the inquiry relative to the conduct of the Duke of York Mr. Whitbread said that "the committee were not fettered by settled forms or principles of evidence as was the case in the courts last year. If once such a limit was imposed upon the investigations of the House of Commons there was an end to the inquisitorial power of Parliament." And Sir Samuel Romilly said that the object was very different from that of courts of justice, and therefore the house could not be bound by the same ties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that for this House to trammel its own exercise of discretion by any rule whatever except the rules well established by parliamentary law would be wrong. I am opposed, therefore, to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday a communication addressed to yourself from Hon. WILLIAM R. MORRISON, chairman of the committee of investigation at New Orleans, accompanied by a communication from the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. MORRISON's communication disclosed the fact that certain persons had been summoned to appear before the committee of which he is chairman, with directions to bring certain telegraphic dispatches, and that the subpœna had been disobeyed and the communication from Mr. Orton disclosed the fact that it was by his directions that that disobedience to the subpœna of the committee took place, and that he had given the direction because in his opinion telegraph dispatches were in their nature privileged communications and could not be brought before a committee of investigation on a subpœna duces tecum, accompanied with the intimation, however, that he would yield his opinion to the judgment of the House. Referring these two communications to the Committee on the Judiciary required them to pass upon two questions, and two only. The first was, has this House the power to cause persons to bring papers before its investigating committees at all, and, secondly, whether telegraphic communications were surrounded by that peculiar odor of sanctity that the gentleman from Ohio and some others suppose; whether Mr. Orton or any one else had authority to prevent the custodian of such dispatches from producing them in obedience to the mandate of the House.

The two resolutions I have offered as a substitute for the report of the committee are substantially the same as that report, only stating, in my judgment, the sense of the House in plainer and more unmistakable terms. The only point, therefore, in dispute is as to whether the House ought to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] I think it ought not, and for this reason: The power of the House to issue a subpœna at all is a matter of law; what may be inserted in that subpœna is also a matter of law. Can this House, therefore, by a mere resolution change the law? Manifestly it cannot; and consequently the resolution, if passed, would be mere brutum fulmen and nothing more, so far as their legal effect would be concerned; but there will be and there can be no dispute beyond that. The gentleman offers as a reason for opposing this amendment that the committee commissioned by this House to make this investigation may violate the law, that it may transcend its duties. Now, sir, for one I will never anticipate such a malversation on the part of a committee of this House. How do we stand in the face of the world here distrusting our own committee and saying that for fear they may transcend a law and violate their duties, we will circumscribe those duties and say "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," no matter what may be the exigencies by which you are surrounded? I do not think the House will be guilty of such discourtesy to its committee. I believe that it will conclude, until it has evidence to the contrary, that the committee will conform to the law as it exists, and will not undertake in advance to give them direction as to their conduct. The passage of this resolution will not take a single iota from the powers that it possesses under the law.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

Mr. MCCRARY. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that this is a favorable opportunity for settling a rule upon a sound basis that shall govern in future the conduct of committees of investigation. There seems to be no effort on either side to prevent the publication of the particular dispatches called for or mentioned in the communication of the chairman of the investigating committee now in Louisiana. On the contrary, I have seen the statement that there is no objection, and I suppose it may be taken to be the fact, that neither of the great political committees of the country, during the recent canvass, have committed important secrets to the telegraph offices of the country.

Therefore I say this is a favorable opportunity for settling upon a reasonable and safe basis the rule which should govern in such cases. The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary believe that there are rights of private citizens which should be considered as well as the rights and interests of the Government and the people. We think that two things at least should be required before the custodian of a private telegraphic dispatch should be required to produce it before a committee of this House. First, that the committee should determine in some way that there is reasonable cause to believe that there are dispatches in the possession of some person that will be material to the matter under investigation. We do not hold that it is necessary to establish that fact any further than this, that the committee shall have reason to believe that there are such dispatches. And, secondly, that in the subpœna which is issued to require the custodian of these private papers to bring them before the committee the papers shall be designated in some manner so that the party in possession of the dispatches may be able to identify them. In other words, we do not think that the practice which has obtained to some extent, of calling for telegraphic dispatches in the gross, of calling for all the dispatches in a particular office, or calling for all the dispatches sent by a particular individual, without any reference to the subject-matter of them, is a reasonable and proper practice.

There can be no difficulty growing out of the adoption of the ru as proposed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary and embodied in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] It is impossible to conceive of a case where a committee of investigation shall have reason to believe that there are telegraphic dispatches in the hands of anybody which are of any value or of any materiality in the course of any investigation and they shall not be able to describe them as accurately as required by the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] If the committee know who have sent the dispatches and to whom they have been sent, that fact can be stated; or if they know the subject-matter of the dispatches, that fact can be stated. And certainly they cannot know or have reason to believe that any dispatch is material to the subject of investigation without knowing what the dispatch is about.

What we object to is the manner of directing subpœnas which has been resorted to in some cases. If I am correctly informed, there has been in one of the committee-rooms of this House a very large number of private telegraphic dispatches, I think some thousands in number, which were brought into the committee-room, not upon any well-founded belief that there was anything in them that the committee desired to know, but they were brought into the committee-room in order that they might look them through to ascertain whether there was anything in those dispatches that they could use in their investigation. And the evil of this very practice will be evident when I state that in some way from among those dispatches a very large number of private telegrams, not relating at all to any subject of inquiry before that committee, have been published in the public press of the country.

I say there is no propriety in, there is no necessity for, carrying to this extent the rule in regard to this kind of evidence. There is no danger that we shall ever be deprived of the right to bring before any committee any paper they ought to have simply by requiring the committee to describe it in the manner proposed by the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] has expired.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will want only five or ten minutes.

Mr. LYNDE. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I shall not probably detain the House longer than five minutes. It appears to me that the question really before the House is not of that character which brings it within the consideration of the rules of evidence or the practice in courts of justice. In my judgment the investigation we have ordered goes further than any other investigation ever authorized by either House of Congress, from the beginning of this Government.

We have appointed a committee, clothed with ample power to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, and to compel the attendance of witnesses. We appointed this committee for the purpose of ascertaining the truth on a question that may determine who shall be the next President of the United States. And in order that that great question now agitating the people of this country shall be determined truthfully and rightfully according to the facts of the case, we have instituted an investigation and delegated to the committee entire power to execute the order of the House. I submit that any attempt to restrain or curtail the power of the committee, any attempt by indirection through legal technicalities to hamper the efficiency of this investigation and prevent its full execution and enforcement, to render it at all difficult to obtain all of the facts, whether those facts depend upon epistolary correspondence or telegraphic communications, appears to me would show that we fall far short of our duties, and we would stand before the world as failing to execute the power which the people have delegated to us to determine this great question.

If it were an ordinary investigation, if it were an original proposition as to what authority we should confer upon a committee, I might myself coincide with some gentlemen who have spoken as to the immorality of attempting to interfere with the sacred privacy of individual correspondence. But in a question of such magnitude, when we are called upon to sustain our own organ in an investigation in a distant part of the country where this House itself cannot convene, where such stupendous consequences, too, may depend upon the ascertainment of these very facts in regard to acts that may have been conducted and controlled by telegraph, I submit with all due respect to the opinions of other gentlemen that, having ordered a full investigation, we should carry out the request of this committee and clothe them with the authority which they have asked of us.

In addition to this, I am informed that the like committee of the Senate have sent out a similar request for the production of everything bearing upon this election; in other words, they propose to institute a "drag-net" investigation, as has been said here to-day. I think, therefore, that we shall do wrong if we do not fully sustain the committee of investigation that we have sent to Louisiana. Hence I am in favor of the report of the Judiciary Committee as made by its chairman; and under no possible circumstances shall I be induced to vote for the proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] the adoption of which, in my judgment, would be tantamount to defeating any investigation whatever in that direction.

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I think the House should at once respond to the very proper distinction which has been suggested by the gentleman making the report of this committee between an investigation conducted by a committee of this House and an investigation conducted before a legal tribunal. In the latter case, in a contest between parties litigant before a court of judicature, the private papers of either party are not subject to production unless the party calling for them makes out such a preliminary state of facts as, in the opinion of the presiding judge, authorizes their production, because of their pertinency and relevancy to the subject-matter in litigation between the parties. But that, I take it, is not the rule in an investigation before a committee of a parliamentary body. The gentleman has well said that such a committee has a broader, less-restricted power; that it is indeed with reference to public matters inquisitorial in its character. To maintain that such a committee, engaged in an important public investigation, should be limited by the rule which applies in a court of law or equity between parties litigant with reference to private rights, would so hamper the power of investigation which this House possesses with reference to matters of public concernment as to render it almost entirely nugatory.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see any very great distinction between the principles embodied in the report of the majority of the committee and the more specific amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. But inasmuch as the latter proposition is a response on behalf of the committee, and in obedience to the order of the House, upon the specific matter referred to the committee for their action, and as, in my judgment, it more fully and completely asserts the power and authority of the House and of committees acting under its orders, the inclination of my mind is to give to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky a preference even to the report of the majority of the committee.

Sir, in a case referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] for whose legal judgment and acumen I have profound respect, in a case occurring at the last session of this Congress, when an attempt was made to assert the power and authority of the House in subjects of investigation, we saw that power and authority defied and rendered nugatory by a refusal to produce papers pertaining to the subject-matter under investigation by a committee. I refer to the well-known case of Hallet Kilbourn.

In the present case the examination by the committee of telegrams sent to and from the city of New Orleans is a resort to a source of information which can alone in all probability yield to the committee the desired facts concerning which this House has instructed them to inquire; for it is natural to suppose that these telegrams were resorted to during the period of the election by both parties, and that the communications between distant portions of the country were conducted by these telegrams. It was not possible for the committee to make a more specific designation than they did in their demand for the production of particular telegrams to which they referred, sent during limited periods. I think therefore that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky conforms more fully and explicitly to the parliamentary rule than does the report of the committee. I call attention to the rule as stated by Cushing. I ask the Clerk to read section 936 of Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies.

The Clerk read as follows:

The order for the attendance of witnesses, or for the issuing of a speaker's warrant to summon them, may also require the production of books, papers, and records. In the former case the order ought to be as specific and to describe the books, papers, or records to be produced with as much certainty as the nature of the case will admit of; in the latter the order may be in as general terms (as, for example, for such books or writings as shall be desired) as the order for issuing the warrant; but the warrant itself should be as specific and as certain as above mentioned. It does not appear to be necessary, however, that the name of the particular witness who is required to produce a paper or other document should be mentioned in the order or warrant, provided he be otherwise designated or may be ascertained with sufficient certainty. Thus the order may direct that the proper person or officer shall attend with the books, papers, or record desired; as, for example, a proper person from a banking-house named, with their banking-books for a particular month; or the proper officer with a specified paper from one of the public offices; or a particular paper may be ordered to be laid before the house, without specifying by whom it is to be done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LYNDE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, if we take the position suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] that there is no difference between telegraphic communications and oral communications so far as this privilege is concerned, we need only take one other step to destroy the last possible protection that the American people enjoy against the invasion of their privacy by their servants, the House of Representatives. If we now declare that the telegraph is to be put down on the level of mere oral communication, that one of the greatest corporations of the country is, turn common informer against all private citizens, the next and last step will be to declare that the post-office is to be put on the plane of the telegraph.

Here is a great institution (unknown to the old law writers) which has grown up within the last thirty-five years, and which is probably to-day, next to the post-office, the custodian of more secrets in relation to public and private affairs than any other institution on earth. Every day hundreds of thousands of our fellow-citizens intrust their most sacredly private affairs to the telegraph companies under the seal of its confidence. It is now proposed that all the transactions conducted through this great instrumentality shall be put down to the level of open, oral communications. All that public or private malice needs is to seize the telegraph operator at any office, require him to bring in his bundle of dispatches, and this inquisitorial body can fish out from among them whatever evidence may happen to suit its passion or its caprice.

There never was an Anglo-Saxon law in any country of the Anglo-Saxon world that would permit so great an invasion of private rights.

Besides destroying the telegraph as a great instrument of commerce and business intercourse, you break down in the minds of our people that security under the law which they have enjoyed for so many generations. I say to gentlemen frankly that you and I have never yet seen a congressional investigation the objects of which were sufficiently important to warrant so great a change in the laws of the country. It were better that every thief should go unwhipped of justice than that the old guarantees of the law should be destroyed in order to secure his punishment.

Now I happened in 1870 to have this question come up in the committee of which I was chairman, the Committee on Banking and Currency, before which a very important investigation was going forward, and there are some gentlemen here who sat with me upon that committee. We were called to investigate the causes which led to the gold panic on what was known as Black Friday. After a large amount of testimony had been taken it was found that at a given moment the Secretary of the Treasury, under direction of the President, wrote a dispatch ordering the sale of gold in New York City; and within a few minutes thereafter the gold market had broken 20 or 30 per cent. (My time is up I see, but if the gentleman will allow me a single moment further I will conclude.) But the break came about ten minutes before the official dispatch reached New York City; and it was strongly probable that some trusted officer of the Government had been faithless and had privately informed parties in New York that the order was coming. It was vitally important to the honor and good faith of the nation that it should be known whether that supposition was true or not. We called the telegraph manager before us to inquire how far they felt at liberty to disclose to us what had passed over their wires between Washington and New York within the brief period of half an hour; and by the unanimous agreement of the committee, democrats and republicans alike, we framed the question narrowed down in this way: First, that within a period of about twenty minutes of time we would make our inquiry; second, that it should only relate to telegrams bearing upon the Government order to sell gold; and, third, that if the telegrams disclosed under these conditions were any of them clearly private, they should be returned to the telegraph company, and not one of them published. That was as far as I thought we could go, and I think it was a wise precedent.

We shall make a most serious mistake if we break over the well-settled rules established for the protection of the business correspondence of citizens. I do not know that the questions now proposed will harm any man of either party. But we ought to remember that the safeguards of liberty are only in danger in times of public passion, and in such times it becomes all thoughtful men to take special heed of their steps, and make no precedents which may come back in calmer times to plague the inventors.

Mr. LYNDE. I will now give two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the doctrine which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has laid down as to the protection which the law throws around the post-office, but I believe that the law does not throw any such protection around communications by telegraph. I think, however, that the law should throw such protection around communications by telegraph, and I should be glad to see it done.

But, sir, I rise now for the purpose of saying to the House and to the gentleman from Ohio that I have good reason to think that the protection which the law secures to citizens as to communications coming through the post-office is more of a delusion and a mistake than he supposes it to be. I wish to say that during the last month my attention has been called to my own letters passing through the New York post-office, and according to the best judgment I can form, and the best judgment of gentlemen to whom I have submitted my letters, they are apparently not infrequently opened in the post-office, and reclosed by the use of mucilage, but so affected that the steam used is shown upon the envelope, which has a puckered appearance. I have of course no means of proving this charge except by the appearance of the envelopes, but I am ready to submit my letters from day to day to the judgment of experts, and I think the gentleman will find the post-office protection is not such as good citizens desire, and such as comes down to us from the old Anglo-Saxon institutions of which he is such an admirer.

And, moreover, I wish to say to him that if there be a protection or should have been a protection for all communications by telegraph, the violation of that protection did not come from the democratic side of the House, but was initiated by a distinguished republican from the State of Massachusetts (General Butler) in the famous impeachment trial of President Johnson. And I can say further that proof of such violation has been afforded by committees of investigation that have been sitting during the present Congress, and notably by the Senate committee of investigation which went into the State of Mississippi, issuing a drag-net subpœna for all of the telegrams which passed to and from Colonel George, of that State.

So while I subscribe and will subscribe to the doctrine that the communications of individuals should be protected as much by telegraph as by mail, I wish to say that there is no choice for us at this time but to open them up freely on both sides. And, sir, I am glad to be able to state that I have during the recent political campaign sent no telegraphic communication which I am not willing and glad to have published. And I have already authorized the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company to produce every telegram which bears my signature. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] allow me to say a single word?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] believes his mails have been tampered with, I think it is his duty, and I will assist him, to have the matter investigated to the bottom. I hope he will move for a committee to investigate that question.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are several propositions, Mr. Speaker, pending before the House on which we are called upon to vote at this time. First to be voted upon is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] in reference to the nature of the papers that may be called for by these investigating committees. I think his proposition states the rule governing such cases more narrowly than is supported by the authorities, and especially than is laid down in Cushing's Manual and other authoritative works on parliamentary law. I think the rule was correctly stated by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.] He referred to Cushing's Manual in support of his position, and called the attention of the House to section 936 of that work. I can see no difference between telegraphic communications and the accounts of a banking association. In the section cited it appears that the books of a banking-house "for a particular month" may be called for. It has been the rule of this House to examine the private banking accounts of various persons; and, notably, the banking account of the President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, during or before his impeachment trial.

The object of this inquiry, instituted by the committee in New Orleans, is the production of official papers of the returning board in one instance and of the telegrams forwarded by certain officials of this Government to the officials in New Orleans, in reference to the count of the votes polled in that State. It is of the utmost importance that all the facts bearing upon this important investigation should be brought to light at this time. Much depends upon this information. We desire the three committees now in the Southern States to get at the bottom facts in relation to the recent elections in those States.

Although it has been announced by certain distinguished gentlemen that we, the representatives of the people, have nothing to do with those facts; that all that remains to be done is in the hands of the President pro tempore of the Senate, who is to receive and to count the votes, and to declare the result as to who has been elected; that this House and the Senate have nothing further to do in the premises. Yet, I maintain that this House and the Senate and the country have a right to know all the facts necessary to a full knowledge of the subjects now being investigated by our committees in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. The committees of this House "are authorized to summon and compel the attendance of all persons, within the limits of the United States, as witnesses, and to bring with them papers and records, in the same manner as is practiced by courts of law." (Cushing, section 634.) The House of Representatives possesses all the powers of jurisdiction, in a judicial way, which are recognized by the common parliamentary law. It has power "to institute inquiries into all grievances of the citizen which are remediable by legislative enactment, and into all abuses of power by persons in office, with a view to their removal or impeachment; it has power to investigate all such subjects, by the examination of witnesses or otherwise, in the same manner as is practiced by grand juries." (Cushing, section 641.) Would not a court of justice or a grand jury have the right to compel the production of telegraphic dispatches in the progress of their investigations? This question has already been passed upon by the courts, and the right to compel the production of telegraphic messages, or to prove their contents, when they cannot be produced, has received judicial sanction. I desire to call the attention of the House to the following authorities upon this subject:

In the case of Henisler vs. Freedman, 2 Parsons' Select Cases, 274, the court held:

> It must be apparent that, if we adopt this construction of the law, the telegraph may be used with the most absolute security for purposes destructive to the well-being of society; a state of things rendering its absolute usefulness at least questionable. The correspondence of the traitor, the murderer, the robber, and the swindler, by means of which their crimes and frauds could be the more readily accomplished, and their detection and punishment avoided, would become things so sacred that they never could be accessible to the public justice, however deep might be the public interest involved in their production.

The court in the same case further held:

The law is jealous of extending the circle of persons excused or interdicted from giving testimony. Parents are required to testify against children; children against parents, brothers against brothers, friends against friends. Communications by letter made under the deepest obligations of friendship, affection, or honor, still must be produced if deemed necessary to the ascertainment of truth, and the administration of justice by the public tribunals. To this great end of social organization all secondary causes are required to give way.—Allen's Telegraph Cases, page 3.

In another case the rule has been laid down as follows:

Nor can telegraphic communications be deemed any more confidential than any other communications. Telegraphic communications are not to be protected to aid the robber or assassin in the consummation of their felonies, or to facilitate their escape after the crime has been committed. No communication should be excluded, no individual should be exempt from inquiry, when the communication, or answer to the inquiry, would be of importance in the conviction of crime or the acquittal of innocence, except when such exclusion is required by some grave principle of public policy. The honest man asks for no confidential communications, for the withholding the same cannot benefit him. The criminal has no right to demand exclusion of evidence because it would establish his guilt. (The State vs. Alden Litchfield, 58 Maine, 267.)

In Nova Scotia an important case on this subject has been decided, in which the lord chief-justice took time to consider, and afterward delivered the following judgment:

In this case, after a full consideration of the general law relating to privileged communications, and as to the true construction of legislative enactment set forth in the special case, and of the decision of Lord Ellenborough in Lee vs. Barrell, 3 Camp., 337, under circumstances so very analagous, I do not entertain a doubt that the communications or messages through the telegraph offices are not in law privileged communications; and that when Mr. Waddell, and others in similar positions, are compelled to attend a judicial proceeding, they are bound to disclose the contents of such messages, and that in so doing they do not at all violate the oath they have taken, that they will not "willfully divulge" the contents of messages, nor do they subject themselves to any prosecution under the enactment. At the same time let it not be supposed that my decision at all affects the obligation such parties are under "not to willfully divulge the contents of messages confided to them. (Waddell's case, 8 Jur., [N. S.,] part 2, page 181; also see Allen's Telegraph Cases, page 497.)

Such being the current of authorities on this subject, I shall favor the substitute submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] which is entirely in harmony with judicial and parliamentary precedents. All that is necessary in calling for telegraphic messages or other papers is that they should be described with sufficient certainty to enable the witness to clearly understand what messages or papers are required. And such description must of necessity be given in every case. It is not necessary, therefore, that the House should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] In all cases where our committees desire telegrams or other papers, the parties required to produce them will be sufficiently informed by the subpœnas duces tecum to enable them to comply with the summons. This is all that the law requires, and affords all the protection which a witness can rightfully claim.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LYNDE. I yield that time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I only rise to express my profound regret that, in this most grave question of the constitutional powers of this House and the constitutional privileges of American citizens, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] alone, on either side of the House, should have seen fit to give an excited partisan turn to the discussion, which I am happy to congratulate the House has not appeared in the other speeches on either side. If the communications of that gentleman through the post-office have been dealt with as he suspects, the use to be made of such a fact is not to throw it into a grave constitutional discussion with excitement and anger. Let him rise in his place, under his responsibility, and demand an investigation; and no matter whether it be a democratic or republican correspondence that has been tampered with, if he have any proof of a charge like that against any official charged with the administration of the Post-Office Department of this country, he knows, he must know, that he will find abundant support on this side of the House in probing the matter to the bottom and in bringing the offenders to condign punishment. But the fact is utterly out of place in a discussion of the character this House is now engaged in.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 72, noes 111.

Mr. MCCRARY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 93, nays 122; not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Bell, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Cason, Chittenden, Conger, Crounse, Davy, Dobbins, Durand, Eames, Evans, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Goodin, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Haymond, Hendee, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoskins, Hunter, Hurd, Kasson, Lane, Leavenworth, Luttrell, Lynch, Magoon, McCrary, McDill, Miller, Monroe, Neal, Norton, Oliver, O'Neill, Packer, Page, William A. Herr Smith, Southard, Strait, Stevenson, Stowell, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodworth, and Yeates—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Carr, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, Dibrell, Douglas, Durham, Ellis, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Gunter, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Henkle, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Humphreys, Hunton, Frank Jones, Kehr, Knott, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Le Moyne, Levy, Lewis, Lynde, Mackey, Maish, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morgan, Mutchler, O'Brien, Payne, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Rea, Reagan, Ribble, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Simmons, William E. Smith, Sparks, Spencer, Springer, Stanton, Stenger, Stone, Swann, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Thomas, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Gilbert C. Walker, Warner, Watterson, Erastus Wells, Whitthorne, Willard, James Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, and Young—122.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Bagby, Banks, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, John Young Brown, Burleigh, John H. Caldwell, Caswell, Chapin, Cochrane, Cox, Crapo, Danford, Darrall, De Bolt, Denison, Dunnell, Eden, Egbert, Flye, Fort, Hays, Henderson, Hoge, Hopkins, House, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyman, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Joyce, Kelley, Kimball, King, Lapham, Lawrence, Lord, MacDougall, McFarland, McMahon, Meade, Morrison, Nash, New, Odell, Phelps, John F. Philips, John Reilly, Rice, Robinson, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Savage, Sayler, Schumaker, Smalls, Stephens, Thompson, Washington Townsend, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Wigginton, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, and Woodburn—74.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the substitute offered by Mr. KNOTT for the resolutions reported by the committee; and, being put, there were—yeas 116, noes 33.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The resolutions reported from the committee, as amended, were then adopted.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1626) for the relief of Thomas Van Duzen and his assignees, for lands.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2043) to improve the law in relation to dower in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4120) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Huron and to provide a temporary government therefor; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

TAMPERING WITH THE MAILS.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas ABRAM S. HEWITT, a member of this House, has asserted on this floor in public speech that his letters, deposited in the post-office at the city of New York, have been illegally opened before delivery and while in charge of the postal officers or employés of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed to investigate said charge, and whether the same be true or false, and by whom, if by any person, said criminal act or acts were committed, and report thereon to this House as early as practicable; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I object to this resolution. It is the duty of the Post-Office Department to make that investigation itself.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire whether by the appropriation act of August 15, 1876, the twenty-one clerks to committees of the House therein mentioned are entitled to receive as compensation during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877, the amount per diem designated in said act for their actual services.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the inquiry, but I know what the intention was, and if there is any uncertainty as to the intention, the matter ought to be provided for by law; it was prospective only.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky ask for the adoption of the resolution, or simply for its reference?

Mr. KNOTT. I ask for its adoption.

Mr. KASSON. What is the object of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to make inquiry as to certain language used in an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. There can be no objection to that.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4259) to re-organize and render more efficient the administration of the Navy Department; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ALASKA SHIP-BUILDING AND LUMBER COMPANY.

Mr. PIPER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4260) granting to the Alaska Ship-building and Lumber Company the right to occupy and purchase certain lands in the Territory of Alaska, paying the Government price therefor, and for other puposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF DESERT LAND.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 125 a bill (H. R. No. 4261) to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN'S REPORT.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a concurrent resolution to print 4,500 copies of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1875 by Professor Hayden; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

FUNDING LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency the preamble and joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read the preamble and joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the legal-tender notes of the United States when first issued were by a provision of the act authorizing them fundable at the option of holders into bonds of the United States bearing 6 per cent. annual interest;

And whereas but for such provision for funding neither the Secretary of the Treasury or either House of Congress would have consented to their issue;

And whereas the exigencies of a prolonged civil war led to the temporary withdrawal of the said funding provision of the legal-tender act;

And whereas it is apparent in the present and prospective condition of the commerce of the country that the amount of paper money in circulation is greatly in excess of the proper demands of trade;

And whereas the Government of the United States is solemnly and firmly bound by act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, to provide for the redemption in coin of its legal-tender notes on and after the 1st day of January, 1879;

And whereas it is obvious that in order to resume coin payments in the manner and at the time fixed by the aforesaid act of Congress the previous withdrawal from circulation of a considerable portion of said legal-tender notes is an indispensable act of preparation;

And whereas it is now apparently practicable to fund said notes in bonds having forty years to run at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. per annum, without commissions or cost to Government;

And whereas the United States must, like all other debtors public or private, provide for and pay all its honest obligations to the extent of its means and resources, or be discredited and dishonored; Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., First, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to withdraw, as soon as the necessary preparations can be made, the legal-tender notes of the United States whenever presented by the holders thereof, and issue therefor, dollar for dollar of face value, coupon or registered bonds of the United States in the spirit of the original legal-tender act: Provided, That the bonds authorized by this act shall be payable in gold at the expiration of forty years from the 1st day of January, 1877, and bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly in gold.

Second. That the bonds authorized by this act shall be available for deposit in the Treasury of the United States for banking purposes under the various provisions of law relating to national banks.

Third. That the legal-tender notes received in exchange for bonds under this act shall be destroyed, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Fourth. That all laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the introduction of this joint resolution.

SALE OF LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table House bill No. 1984, to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, for the purpose of moving a non-concurrence in said amendments and requesting a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendments be reported.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "act" insert "in accordance with the provisions of said former act, except as hereinafter stated as to price."

Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out "or a delegation thereof duly authorized."

Page 2, lines 5 and 6, strike out "or of a delegation thereof duly authorized."

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and that a committee of conference be requested.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following; which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 4124, to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment No. 1 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of "30" insert "35" (making the appropriation $35,000) and add at the end of the section amended the following:

"And the Clerk of the House shall pay such parts of the sum above appropriated as the chairmen of the said committees respectively shall, in writing, direct for the purposes aforesaid to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, who shall, as soon thereafter as practicable, make report, in writing, to the House of the manner in which the sums thus paid to him have been expended, accompanied with vouchers in detail; which report and vouchers, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts of the House, shall be deemed a sufficient settlement of his accountability for the money thus paid to him; and any unexpended balance remaining in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms after such settlement shall be paid by him into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the fund for which it was appropriated."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment No. 2 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "30" insert "35," (making the appropriation $35,000;) and the House agree to the same.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
J. D. C. ATKINS,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. WINDOM,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word in explanation of this report. Gentlemen will remember that the bill as originally passed by the House appropriated $21,000 to meet the expenses of three special committees appointed to visit the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, respectively. That bill was amended by the Senate by the addition of a new section appropriating $50,000 to meet the expenses of four committees of the Senate, three of them to visit the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, respectively, and the other to remain at the Capitol.

When the bill came back to the House thus amended, the House increased the appropriation for its committees from $21,000 to $30,000, there having been appointed an additional committee of the House to investigate the recent election in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, and reduced the appropriation for the Senate committees from $50,000 to $30,000, making the appropriation for this purpose the same for each House.

The House also by its amendments to the bill, after it came back from the Senate, provided for limiting the expenditure of the money thereby appropriated to the actual and necessary expenses of the members of the committees, making the actual and necessary expenses the rule of expenditure by both the committees of the House and the committees of the Senate.

Gentlemen understand that heretofore no very definite rule on this subject has prevailed. Sometimes the allowance has been ten cents a mile for travel and as high as $6 a day for hotel expenses. That has been perhaps as uniform a rule as any other. Ten cents a mile for travel is of course greatly above the actual expenditure and $5 or $6 a day greatly above the actual expense for hotel bills. The object of this bill was to establish, both as regards the House and the Senate, the principle that only actual expenses should be paid by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The result reached by the conference committee is not altogether satisfactory. It is one of those inevitable compromises out of which a great deal of our legislation grows. The House indulged the confident belief that, although its committees were the larger and occupied a wider field, $30,000 would still be a sufficient sum to be appropriated for them. The Senate, on the other hand, thought $50,000 as small a sum as would suffice for the expenses of its committees. Witnesses are now being subpœnaed by the Senate from Oregon, from Mississippi, and from various other sections of the country. The House has adopted, as a rule of compensation for witnesses, five cents a mile for travel (which is very ample) and $3 a day for expenses while in attendance. The Senate, on the other hand, allows five cents a mile for travel (except, I believe, where the travel is from beyond the one hundredth parallel, in which case the rate is seven cents a mile) and $4 a day for expenses during the attendance of the witness.

The Senate committees having charge of these investigations, as well as the conferees upon the part of the Senate, were of opinion that $50,000 was not too large a sum. The subject was finally adjusted upon an appropriation of $35,000 for each body. In view of the fact that in the one case the sitting of the committee is at the Capitol and in the other case at the scene of the matters investigated, it is very manifest that little or no difference will exist between the two bodies as to the actual expenditure. Therefore the appropriation on very fair grounds should be about the same for the two bodies. Hence the committee of conference finally agreed to fix the appropriation at $35,000 for each branch of Congress and to provide for returning to the Treasury any surplus that may remain. I indulge the hope that a very considerable amount may be left unexpended at the close of these investigations.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask one question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. If the committee on the part of the House thought that $30,000 was enough for the House committees, why should they have yielded to the demands of the Senate and increased the appropriation to $35,000?

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the gentleman has been on committees of conference, and has found that it is somewhat difficult for either House to have absolutely its own way.

Mr. CONGER. But I understood the gentleman to say that the House committee were of opinion that an appropriation of $30,000 for the House was enough. Why then should they have been forced by the Senate to vote $35,000?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very clear that, if $35,000 will be required to meet the current expenses of four committees on the part of the Senate, it will require at least as much to meet the expenses of the committees on the part of the House; for, as the gentleman is aware, the House committees are larger in number. The House sends to States of the South thirty members to investigate concerning the recent elections in Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina. The Senate, on the other hand, sends but nine members. The gentleman must see that, if it was proper for the House to concede an appropriation of $35,000 for Senate committees, it was proper that at least as large a sum should be appropriated on the part of the House; for, if $35,000 will be required for the Senate committees, it is very clear that at least the same amount, if not more, will be required for the House committees.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that the committee on the part of the House thought $30,000 enough for this body.

Mr. HOLMAN. My belief still is that $30,000 is all that can be properly expended for either House. The House conferees, contrary to their wishes, compromised this question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question almost equivalent to the question put by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I wish to ask the gentleman how in his conscience he could find any authority whatever on the part of this committee to raise the appropriation for the House from $30,000 to $35,000, when in his solemn judgment as expressed upon this floor $30,000 was more than sufficient.

Mr. HOLMAN. I greatly admire the tender conscience of my friend.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I call the gentleman's attention to this consideration: what right had he to yield to the judgment of the Senate in this matter, and what influence has been brought to bear upon him by the Senate in order to control his judgment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed my friend wished to ask some pertinent question. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. As the gentleman cannot answer my question, I presume he has no conscience in this matter.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am not sure whether I correctly understood this report as it was read, but if I did, the expenditures on the part of the House are to be audited and passed upon by the Committee of Accounts upon actual vouchers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. But I do not understand that in the conference report any such rule is made applicable to expenditures on the part of the Senate. Now I would like to know how this conference committee on the part of the House can reconcile it to their sense of justice and propriety that the Senate should be permitted in this way to legislate as to how we shall expend the money for our own purposes when the rule is not made applicable to the Senate committees.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule as to the House fixed by this report is substantially the same for both bodies. The gentleman from New York is aware that the practice of the two bodies in reference to the drawing and expenditure of money out of the contingent fund is different. Unless we provide in this way for the auditing of the expenditure of this money on the part of the Sergeant-at-Arms by the Committee of Accounts, it could not be audited at all. In the Senate the auditing of accounts occurs between the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Clerk of the Senate, while here it occurs between the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Committee of Accounts of the House. There is by this conference report provision for the auditing in both bodies, here by the Committee of Accounts and in the Senate by the Clerk of the Senate. The gentleman from New York, therefore, will perceive that the rule is substantially the same in both bodies.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If that be the rule then why put it in this conference report?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish it to be the law. I am not aware of any well-established rule in the House on this subject. I hope never to see a dollar of the public money placed in the hands of any officer of the House, under any circumstances, in reference to which provision is not made for the auditing of its expenditure. I want all accounts to be audited by some recognized committee of the House or by some recognized officer.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is not the expenditure confined to the actual and necessary expenses?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee of Accounts here determines what is actual and necessary, and in the Senate provision is made for auditing what are actual and necessary expenses. The result is the same, as the gentleman from New York will perceive. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the conference report was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT, IDAHO.

Mr. FENN, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 538) to create an additional land district in the Territory of Idaho; which motion was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CITADEL, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House, the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Gillmore, of the United States Army, relative to the building and grounds known as the Citadel, Charleston, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

TROOPS AT FORT SILL, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the number of troops now at Fort Sill, Indian Territory, and Forts Griffin and Richardson, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. MACKEY as a member of the board of directors for the Columbia Hospital for Women, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. POWELL, for one week from the 22d instant on account of important business.

To Mr. MONEY, from Thursday next until January 3.

To Mr. ODELL, until January 2 on account of important business.

To Mr. O'NEIL, for three days from the 26th instant.

To Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the 27th to the 30th of December, inclusive.

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, from the 26th instant to the 5th of January.

To Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, from the 21st instant until January 2.

To Mr. STEVENSON, for ten days from Friday next on account of important business.

To Mr. OLIVER, for two weeks from Thursday next.

To Mr. SEELYE, for ten days from the 22d instant.

To Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, from Friday the 23d instant, until January 3.

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, for ten days from the 22d instant.

To Mr. ASHE, for ten days from the 23d instant.

To Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the 27th instant to January 10.

To Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, from the 23d instant to January 3.

To Mr. WARREN, for three days from the 26th instant.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAGE, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. DURAND: The petition of disabled soldiers of Michigan, for an appropriation for artificial limbs, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama: Petition of citizens of Blount and Winston Counties, Alabama, for the passage of the bill introduced by Mr. G. W. HEWITT for the relief of settlers on lands claimed by the South and North Railroad, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WALKER, of Virginia: The petition of R. A. Brock, corresponding secretary and librarian of the Virginia Historical Society; James McDonald, State librarian of Virginia; W. H. Ruffner, superintendent of public instruction of Virginia; J. C. Southall; P. C. Nicholas, librarian of the Virginia State Law Library; J. William Jones, secretary Southern Historical Society, Richmond, Virginia, and of the officers of libraries in different sections of the country, for the purchase by Congress of the papers of the General Count de Rochambeau, the commander of the French forces sent to aid Washington in our revolutionary struggle for national Independence, to the joint Committee on the Library.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report made to that Department by Carlisle P. Patterson, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, stating the progress of that work during the year ending June 30, 1876; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, in which they represent "that there are extensive tracts of the public lands in Eastern Oregon which may be properly termed 'desert lands,' being such on account of the lack of water to furnish the necessary irrigation for the production of crops; that there are also other extensive tracts of land in Eastern Oregon producing grass, but which are unavailable for grazing purposes, on account of the absence of streams of water or springs sufficient to furnish water for herds or flocks grazing upon the same. These lands cannot be disposed of by the United States under existing laws, for the reason that they are not available for the purposes of settlement on account of want of water as aforesaid." They therefore pray "that an act of Congress be passed authorizing the sale of these tracts, in quantities greater than one hundred and sixty acres to a single purchaser and at rates less than the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, upon condition that the same be irrigated by the purchaser, by means of artesian wells or artificial canals, so as to render the same productive and available for grazing and agricultural purposes." I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of citizens of the United States, soldiers in the late war, praying the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the New Jersey State Temperance Alliance, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3497) granting a pension to James B. Treadwell, major of the Eighty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 1040) to allow the late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia his salary hitherto withheld, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1096) to remove the political disabilities of R. C. Gatlin, of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition and a letter from Judge Parker, of the United States district court of Arkansas, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1097) to provide for the appointment of an official short-hand reporter for the United States courts in and for the district of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1098) granting a pension to S. M. B. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1099) granting a pension to Amy King; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1100) making appropriations for the improvement of Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers from Portland, Oregon, to the sea; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia is excused.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to fill the vacancy.

Mr. BARNUM, on his own motion, was excused from further service upon the Committee on Manufactures; and the President pro tempore, by unanimous consent, was authorized to fill the vacancy.

Mr. JOHNSTON was appointed to fill the vacancy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also appointed Mr. BARNUM to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Patents occasioned by the resignation of Mr. JOHNSTON.

MANNER OF COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. There lies on the table a resolution from the Committee on Printing to print some additional copies of a document prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate on the action of the two Houses in regard to the manner of counting the electoral vote. It has been lying over for some time, I believe, at the suggestion of some Senator who desired something else to be added to it. The committee wish to have the resolution acted upon before the recess in order that the type may not be kept standing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the resolution be taken from the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing December 13:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the statement prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate in regard to the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President from 1789 to 1873 be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4124) to provide for the expenses of certain special committees.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1688) for the relief of Robert H. Flavell, sergeant Company F, Seventh Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4258) to provide for the payment for certain improvements on lands now embraced in the military reservation of Fort Cameron in the Territory of Utah.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a resolution upon the table introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] who is not in his seat—I am not sure that he is in the city to-day—providing for a recess. I suppose there is no parliamentary objection to stating what the other House has done in this respect. We all know that the House of Representatives has agreed to adjourn over for the constitutional period, to meet each day of adjournment and adjourn again, and so on until Wednesday, the 3d of January. If the Senate is disposed to take a recess, as I suppose it is, inasmuch as it is manifest there will be no quorum here, we might either pass the resolution that is now upon the table, with the concurrence of the House, confining the recess to the Senate but asking the concurrence of the House, or there might be a general understanding like that which has been adopted in the House; there, I believe, by a formal resolution. I think some Senators object to a formal resolution to this effect here on the ground that it would not be valid; and it certainly would not be valid against any subsequent vote of the Senate. If no other Senator has a suggestion to offer, I suggest that the Senate adjourn from to-morrow until Tuesday and from Tuesday until the next Friday; that is as long as we can adjourn; and then from that Friday until Tuesday, the 2d of January. Let that be the general understanding.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And from Tuesday the 2d of January to Wednesday the 3d?

Mr. ANTHONY. And from Tuesday to Wednesday the 3d of January. That would make our recess the same length as the recess of the House, and leaves it in the power of the Senate, if any exigency should occur, to take any action that might be deemed necessary. I make that suggestion if no Senator has any other suggestion to make or any formal resolution to offer.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What is the suggestion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that by general consent the Senate shall adjourn from to-morrow until Tuesday; that on Tuesday it adjourn until Friday, and on Friday that it adjourn until Tuesday following, and from that Tuesday until Wednesday the 3d of January.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Without the transaction of business in the mean time?

Mr. ANTHONY. Without the transaction of any business in the mean time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Unless by special call.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course it is possible that something may occur, though I anticipate nothing, which would make it necessary for the Senate to transact business, in which case there should be a special call and notice given. I do not suppose the Senate would pledge themselves or that they could pledge themselves not to transact business if any great emergency should arise, which no one anticipates, however. This is the way it has been done on several holidays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the resolution be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not propose a resolution. The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania to take a regular holiday recess is the basis of my suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the House resolution pending?

Mr. ANTHONY. The House passed a resolution that does not require the concurrence of the Senate, referring only to its own action.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the proposition pending before us now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island. No formal proposition is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I read the resolution of the House, and I supposed it would be communicated to the Senate, but probably it will not be as it is a mere resolution of the House. I think that resolution embodies about what the Senate ought to do. If the House for any purpose have some fear that there may be a necessity, on account of public business to aid in the investigations pending, to call the House together, (because it leaves the body in a state of organization so that it may be organized,) I do not see why the Senate may not do the same by a vote of the Senate. We have the power to do it, I think.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I suppose the reason why this is put in the shape of a suggestion rather than as a resolution, is the doubt as to the right of the Senate to pass such a resolution as has been passed by the House. We can only adjourn over for three days, and it is avoiding that rule for us to pass a resolution in advance that at the end of the third day we will adjourn for three days more, and so on, while we can have this general understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt at all that if at the end of the three days' adjournment any Senator should demand a division and the division should show the absence of a quorum, those who were present would have to adjourn only until the next day. That is perfectly clear. You cannot make an adjournment by the action of the Senate alone for a longer period than three days; but it seems to me it is better to have that understanding in the form of an open resolution. Of course no one would violate an obligation of that kind; but all assenting to it that would be the end of it. I do not care about the mode in which it is arrived at. As a matter of course, any Senator may prevent the adjournment, whether it be agreed upon in the form of a suggestion or in the form of a resolution. If any one demands a division so as to show the absence of a quorum, the number present less than a quorum cannot do anything except to adjourn until the next day, and then the next day, and so on, the Senators in that way coming and going.

Mr. INGALLS. The constitutional provision which declares that neither House during the session of Congress shall without the consent of the other adjourn for more than three days, evidently does not require a joint adjournment of both Houses at the same time. As I understand that provision, either House with the consent of the other can adjourn for a period of more than three days, and the House consenting may still remain in session. It occurs to me that if the Senate desires an adjournment for a period longer than three days, by passing a resolution to that effect and transmitting it to the House of Representatives and asking their consent, as the Constitution provides, there would be no objection; and it appears to me that inasmuch as an adjournment from day to day, or for a period of three days only, would leave those Senators who live at a distance from the seat of Government unable to visit their constituents without the liability of business being transacted, that would be the proper course to pursue. I merely make that suggestion for the further action of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suppose the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island was for the purpose of avoiding an objection which I remember to have been made in this body at one time. I think a proposition very similar to that of the House was once made here and objected to, and according to my recollection the whole Senate concurred in the doctrine that we could not fix a day of adjournment beyond the three days to which we might adjourn under the Constitution, for another and an additional adjournment. The Senate may adjourn to-day for three days; such is the Constitution; but until that time comes—such was the objection of the Senate then, I recollect—it is not competent for the Senate to fix an additional adjournment; but when that time comes it may do it. By adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island we avoid that trouble. That is all there is of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, we do avoid that trouble, I beg to suggest to my honorable friend, provided there be a quorum present, that quorum which alone the Constitution says may transact business, any business, this business among others. The Constitution provides:

> Each House shall be the judge * * * and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island who has this matter in charge that if by an understanding, or in any other way, it should be proposed that the Senate adjourning on Friday should stand over till Monday, and on Monday should adjourn further until Thursday, then if on Monday there were no quorum here, less than a quorum could do nothing but adjourn from day to day. Very likely that might in another way really answer the Senator's purpose. An understanding no doubt would be observed, indeed necessarily must be observed, as to doing business, because only a quorum could proceed to transact business. Less than a quorum could not adjourn for over three days but could simply adjourn from day to day. The Senator from Maine referred to a matter in the Senate, which in my recollection arose as to the power of both Houses. It was suggested that inasmuch as both Houses could adjourn together sine die or for a period, it was competent for the two Houses acting together to instruct the presiding officers on a certain day to adjourn their respective Houses to another day, and on that day, unless otherwise ordered, to adjourn their respective Houses to another day, the purpose being to enable a quorum to assemble on either of those days and otherwise order, so that the two Houses would be left in session. I think that was the instance to which the honorable Senator from Maine referred. However, that is not very important for this purpose. I see no difficulty in having a three days' adjournment, and then in the absence of a quorum proceeding to adjourn from day to day. I should see great difficulty in any understanding, or rather in any attempt to execute any understanding under which a number of Senators less than a quorum were to do any business whatever, except to adjourn from day to day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I made not a motion, but a suggestion. We might have an informal understanding on this subject, precisely as we often have, that we will take a certain vote at four o'clock. That understanding we frequently make; it is binding upon nobody except as a matter of honor; it is parliamentarily binding upon no one. I suppose the objection which the Senator from New York suggests would not arise because if there was no quorum for the purpose of business, the absence of a quorum would not be brought to the attention of the Chair, as we frequently transact business when there is no quorum. I suppose a motion would be made to adjourn for three days, and it would be put and carried; but certainly if the attention of the Chair was brought to the absence of a quorum, if that test were applied by any division being called for, there being an absence of a quorum disclosed, I suppose the Senate could adjourn only from day to day. Therefore I suggested that there be an informal understanding that to-morrow we shall adjourn for three days, and then for three days, and then for three days again, which has been frequently done here, and it is done now by the House. It is done in the House by a formal resolution. I propose that we shall do it informally because it does not seem to us to be in our constitutional power to make such a form of adjournment formally.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am unable to concur in any agreement or even tacitly to consent to any agreement that shall indicate the power of either House of Congress to adjourn for more than three days unless under the joint consent of the two Houses. I do not construe the Constitution as the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has done. I do not hold that the Senate may give the House the power to adjourn for thirty days, the Senate itself remaining in session, or vice versa the House permit the Senate to adjourn for thirty or sixty days, the House remaining in session. I consider that it was contemplated by the Constitution that the sessions of Congress should be continuous and not broken by the variant action of one House by adjourning for more than three days.

Such being my view, it being the intention that the legislative operations of the country represented by the Congress should not be broken in upon by the sole action of one House by adjourning for more than three days at a time, it would seem to me highly objectionable that we should by this open proclamation adopt the indirect machinery of the power of adjourning for nine days under the pretext that we simply were agreeing to adjourn for three.

I am perfectly aware that the practical result will be that stated by the honorable Senator from New York. We adjourn under our right and power for three days; at the end of that time it is in the power of any Senator present to disclose by a call for a vote by yeas and nays the absence of a quorum. Then nothing is in order but a motion to adjourn, which may be carried by less than a quorum; so that, in substance, the same thing would be reached; but I cannot assent that there shall be a proposition made as made by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, that we should here now, practically, to-day settle three consecutive adjournments of three days each, aggregating nine days, under the power to adjourn for three. I do not think that is regular, nor am I willing by my silence to consent to it. I do not know whether the House resolution of adjournment is before the Senate or not.

Mr. CONKLING. It has not been sent here at all. It was simply a resolution of their own.

Mr. BAYARD. I had heard indirectly that there was a proposition to adjourn from to-morrow until Wednesday, which is a day longer, that we can probably concur in, and on next Wednesday whether there be or not a quorum present the fact will be easily ascertained, and then if there be not a quorum undoubtedly it will be in the power of the Senate to transact no business except to adjourn, which can be done by less than a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a resolution drawn by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which I think covers the case and relieves us from all difficulty. I offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That when the Senate adjourns on Friday the 22d instant it be to meet on Tuesday the 26th instant; and that, unless otherwise then ordered, when it adjourns on the 26th instant it be to meet on the 29th instant; and that, unless otherwise then ordered, when it adjourns on the 29th instant it be to meet on Tuesday, January 2, 1877.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer that in lieu of the pending motion.

Mr. MORTON. I think that resolution is proper. The Senate can meet and sit on its own adjournment without consulting the House, so that it is not over three days. We can agree to meet every other day, instead of every day, if we choose, or we can agree to meet on a series of days named in a resolution like this without consulting the House, provided the adjournment in each case does not extend over a period of three days. The Senate can fix its own periods of adjournment, so that they do not extend over three days, or we can fix a series of days on which we may meet, as this resolution does, without the consent of the House. We can pass the resolution without at all violating the Constitution.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I venture to say one word about this resolution. I cannot vote for it, although I should be very willing to see its object accomplished in another way. The Constitution declares that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. That means something, and I supposed I knew what it meant. If the meaning generally ascribed to it is the true meaning, how can it be that by an indirection so slight as that now proposed we can circumvent the whole thing? Obviously, the same power which permits an adjournment in that mode for nine days, in the same mode would permit an adjournment for ninety days. Can that be, that by making a stepping stone once in three days in a resolution passed in the beginning, once for all, either House can adjourn for the entire session? You have only to extend it and to say that when they meet on the last day named they shall adjourn three days, and on that day three days more, and so continue that till the 4th of March. Can that be the meaning of the Constitution? I differ, with deference of course, with the Senator from Rhode Island who offers this resolution and one of the Senators from Vermont who is referred to as having approved it. But having attended somewhat to a discussion on one occasion especially which I think was the one referred to a few moments ago by the Senator from Maine, I have a very fixed opinion that this is beyond any suggestion of power heretofore made.

I remember very well that when a resolution was offered a few years ago in the Senate, a discussion arose upon this form of the question. As I before suggested, it was proposed, both Houses concurring, not to adjourn sine die, but to direct the presiding officers in the usual form to adjourn their respective Houses on a certain day; nobody doubted that power; but the resolution went on to provide that on that day, unless a quorum assembled and ordered otherwise, the respective presiding officers should adjourn the Houses until another day; and that when that day arrived, unless a quorum met and ordered otherwise, the presiding officers should adjourn their respective Houses to a further day. Many Senators doubted the power even to do that, but of course it did not touch this question. There was the concurrent action of both Houses. Confessedly, they could adjourn for any time within constitutional limits. They could not adjourn beyond the first Monday of the succeeding December, because the Constitution said they should meet on that day, or if not the Constitution in terms, an act of Congress passed to execute the Constitution, and without repealing that they could not pass that period. But within that period the two Houses could adjourn to any time they saw fit. The question was whether, having exerted that power and fixed a day of meeting, they could in advance direct that on that day a further adjournment should occur, and so on.

The power which in that case was invoked at the hands of the two Houses and questioned somewhat, (although I confess I had no doubt about it myself then and I have never seen any reason to doubt it since,) it is proposed now to exercise by dint of the resolution of one House. I confess my understanding has been otherwise; and although I have no objection to the purpose being accomplished in this way if the Constitution permits it, I think that an understanding by which the Senate is to adjourn from day to day for a certain time unless some paramount necessity for being here arises would be the more convenient way of getting at it, and, except in the light of some instruction which I have not, I must think this resolution goes beyond the permission of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not appear to me that this proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island is open to any constitutional objection. The Constitution declares that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. Now, this resolution provides for an adjournment for three days, beginning to-morrow. I suppose nobody would probably question our capacity to pass to-day an order as to what hour the Senate should adjourn or for what length of time within the constitutional limit of three days. That brings us then—as I am sure my friend from New York will agree—lawfully and constitutionally to Tuesday next. The Senate then meets. It has the capacity by this order of its own, framed for that purpose, either to go on with its business or to adjourn as it likes; but it is taken for granted that the present wish of the Senate, not to do any business on that day, will continue unless the Senators then present shall think it advisable to proceed. If they do think it advisable to proceed, then this resolution provides that on that occasion, without anything lying over for a day for consideration, but by an order made then, they may provide for any other adjournment or for no adjournment at all, according to their convenience; and so on upon the next occasion.

So it is not a mandate to the presiding officer of this body that on Tuesday next he shall execute the present order of the Senate to adjourn this body for three days more; but it is only a provisional mandate that, everybody consenting—that is the substance of it—the Senate consenting, a majority consenting, he shall proceed to declare a further adjournment. If a majority does not wish to assent then, it has the complete constitutional power to stay. In the other point of view there would be great force in what the Senator from New York suggests, because on Tuesday next, if we had an absolute and peremptory order, it would be the duty of the presiding officer to execute it; and he could receive no motion, because it would be his business to execute the order, and, the order being executed, there would be no Senate to receive any motion or to act upon it. But in this case the Senate on next Tuesday meets with entire control of the subject, only, if it should happen that there should be no quorum present, the Senate would not be competent to prevent the adjournment that had been provided for.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would ask my friend whether the adjournment on next Tuesday would not be by virtue of the action of to-day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And, if so, are we not, in fact, adjourning for more than three days?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President. It is by virtue undoubtedly of the original action of this day, but it is also by virtue of an action which is submitted to the will of the Senate again to change on the day when it does meet and adjourn. That is the difference which makes to my mind a broad difference between the case argued by the Senator from New York and what is implied in my friend's question. I think I quite agree with the Senator from New York that what is said to have taken place in the House of Representatives is outside of the Constitution, and clearly so if it provides as the newspapers seem to say for an adjournment for four days instead of three days, which apparently from the newspapers was the case. But it is not my purpose, and it is not my right, to comment, except as upon a public question of law, on any action the House of Representatives sees fit to take.

So then I do not think there is any difficulty in the way of this resolution if the Senate wish to get over these holidays without obliging the presiding officer to come here every day, and with a unanimous understanding that we are to do nothing, which morally is just as unconstitutional as anything else, for aught I know. When it comes to the effect of the thing, I am quite willing to work the whole time except on Christmas and New Year's days, and am still more willing to play if the rest desire to do that. I have no affirmative disposition to adjourn at all, except for these two holy days; but at the same time, as I have found after great resistance for many years, that it is impossible to have it otherwise, I am quite willing that everybody else shall go home for Christmas and New Year's, if he wishes to do so. We have found as a fact that it is practically impossible to do any business during the period named; and when we have undertaken to do it the effort has always proved a disastrous failure, as well in what little we did do generally as in what we omitted to do. So I have concluded to make a virtue of what is inevitable and give as little trouble to other people, including the presiding officer, as possible.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] made, as I felt sure he would if he took that view of the question, the best statement which can be made in vindication of the power asserted by the resolution. After hearing him, I suggest this to the Senator from Vermont and to the Senate: When this interval has passed by, how will this resolution and the action occurring under it stand on the Journal and stand in history? To-day the Senate makes an order which adjourns the Senate three days hence. On that day, no Senator appears, no quorum appears, no action is taken, and another three days elapse in the absence of the Senate. At the end of those three days no quorum appears; no action is taken. Three days more elapse in the absence of the Senate. In the absence of the Senate why and how? Because alone of the order passed to-day. The Senate has been vacant, has been absent, has been in the language of the Constitution in adjournment for nine days by virtue of what action? Not the action of both Houses, which the Constitution suggests as an appropriate action, but by the action of the Senate alone, not saying in terms "we adjourn for nine days in bulk," but saying "we adjourn nine days, three days at a time, and we do it all at once; we do it by one single act which speaks but once, upon which action is taken but once, and which covers the whole nine days." If it does not, it would be a lawless disregard of duty for Senators not coming here. The only excuse for their not appearing three days hence is that the order of the Senate dispenses with that appearance and does not intend to require them to be here until the lapse of six days after that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I be allowed to put a question to the Senator?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask whether we do not now have a standing order, which is imperative until it is changed, that we shall adjourn over from Saturday to Monday on every occasion. Now, suppose saying that Sunday is a dies non, we had a standing order that we should adjourn every week from Friday to Monday, does the Senator think that would infringe upon the Constitution?

Mr. CONKLING. Well, I should think in that case it would not, for several reasons, one of which will probably suffice. It is that intermediately of each two of these Fridays, happening between each two of these recesses, is a meeting and presence of the Senate, thus totally separating and isolating from each other each of those adjournments. But if we were to pass an order that we shall adjourn from Friday to Monday each week, and that on Monday we shall adjourn until Thursday and on Thursday shall adjourn to Friday of each week, my honorable friend would have a case parallel to this; and in either case, I submit to him, that he ascribes to the House—I choose to say the House for illustration—the power to say this week or next week that there shall not be another day during the present session of Congress which will not be dies non.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not maintain that position.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not suppose the Senator maintained it; but I say he concedes it as a matter of argument, as I understand the law. I do not mean to put any words into his mouth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not concede that. I think I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me state in other words what I mean; and I do not intend to detain the Senate on this matter. If it be true that the House of Representatives by adjourning three days at a time, by at once, by a single order, putting it in that form, could carry itself over for nine days, it is true it could carry itself over for ninety days, and the only difference is the trouble it would give to the scrivener to continue this repetition and expansion of the resolution. As matter of power, if the Constitution does not nominate three days and only three as the time and the whole of it during which either House may absent itself without the consent of the other, then ninety days is not the limit, nor is there a limit until you find a constitutional or statutory provision which fixes a day on which the two Houses must meet. It is said in the act of 1792 that on the second Wednesday of February in every fourth year the Congress shall be in session, the purpose being that the presidential vote shall then be counted. Whether in view of that statute such a resolution as this which should make the second Wednesday in February one of the days when the House is not to be in session, would or would not be effectual is a question to be determined by the force of that statute, perhaps; but saving a case where a statute requires the presence of the House, I submit to the Senate that, if this resolution be within the purview of the Constitution, either House may adjourn, simply saying in the resolution they do it three days at a time, for ninety days, or for any other period within the life of that House.

Mr. President, I do not desire, particularly with so small an inducement of convenience as there seems to be here, to try a pioneer experiment of this sort. I speak with some confidence when I say that such a thing was never done in the history of either House. I would not venture to assert that upon general recollection; but having had a few years ago considerable to do with a resolution asserting the power of both Houses to go from day to day, and having looked with some care at that time at the precedents, and having heard disquisitions by much more learned men which I remember, I venture to state with some confidence that there is not in the parliamentary history of this country a resolution like this or resembling it sufficiently to suggest any such power. If it be the pleasure of a majority of the Senate to take a vacation over the holidays, the mode of doing it is so very simple,—by adjourning for three days with a general understanding among Senators that they are not to expect each other to attend at the next meeting and that at that time, there will be doubtless somebody here to move an adjournment from day to day—it is so simple to adjust it by an understanding of that sort, that I repeat the inducement of convenience even seems to me very small; but even if it were a great inducement, I should hesitate to affirm the judgment of the Senate in favor of a power which I can see, exerted by one House or the other, might be inconvenient and hurtful, I am sure, to say the least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will only occupy a single moment of the time in reply to my friend from New York. I think the essential difference between the case that he discusses, and which he has discussed in such a way as to very strongly incline me to agree with him on that case, and this is manifest. When the Senate meets here on next Tuesday, the first period of the adjournment, it meets for business. This order, if adopted, would not prevent the Senate sitting continuously if it liked to do so for a week or for any other length of time that the public interest should require. It only says that when it adjourns on that day, unless otherwise ordered at that meeting, the adjournment shall be for a certain period within the letter of the Constitution. Now, if on next Tuesday only two Senators come, and they wish to otherwise order, they are not bound to adjourn, they have a right to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of all the others, and to stay here until they are brought in, and to go on then with the business of the country as long as they like.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. By the rule now the Senate meets every day, Sundays excepted, unless otherwise ordered. We may change that general rule and agree to meet every other day unless otherwise ordered. May we not, then, fix the days, name them, instead of measuring the time the other way, so that we do not put it over the three days? What is the difference in principle?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see the difference if you always keep within the control of the Senate the power, on the day at which the fresh order or the old order operating anew is to operate, to prevent its operation and to go on with business. I think this is an entirely different proposition from what one would be directing the presiding officer of the Senate on Tuesday next peremptorily to adjourn this body for one day, or for two, or for three, because it is no worse constitutionally to adjourn for three days than it is for one, and so on from day to day. That would be one thing that would fall within the very forcible observations of the Senator from New York. But if on the day when you meet you have all the power that the Constitution gives you to stay and do business as long as you like, and simply provide that when you do adjourn that day, unless you choose to fix some other time, it shall be to the next day or to the next day but one, or to the third day, I fail to see any in fractionof the Constitution in it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think it was the wise man who said that there was nothing new under the sun. If he had lived to-day I do not think he would have uttered that exclamation. I think we have got something new here. Certainly in my judgment it is entirely new. If we can adjourn over three days at a time without the concurrence of the other branch of the Legislature, we can come here and adjourn during the whole session, sitting only every third day. If that is not in contravention of the plain meaning and intent of the Constitution, then I do not understand the force of language.

Now I want to put this case; I want to show the force of this resolution if it be adopted. It is adopted, I will assume, and I will assume that on Tuesday next this body meets, and having met, some Senator in the body may come to the conclusion that it is appropriate, that the public exigencies demand that there shall be some public business transacted; but the body finds itself without a quorum. The Constitution says that this body may transact all legislative business, but it provides that it shall require a quorum of members to do it. The Senate finds itself without a quorum. What then are its powers? The Constitution says that the body consisting of less than a quorum may adjourn from day to day. What could the body do on Tuesday next with a less number than a quorum? They could adjourn only from day to day while under this order they would adjourn over three days. We are therefore fixing an order to-day that contravenes the express grant of power in that particular, if I can understand it.

I do not want to take up time in discussing this resolution. I have my own ideas. I am very sorry that it is offered here. I do think that it is a very bad precedent to set. I think it is in contravention of the Constitution as clearly as anything can be. I will not express any opinion in relation to the propriety of an adjournment over, whether it be by agreement or in any other way; but if we are going to do it I do hope we shall do it in that way which will leave no doubt upon the mind of any one.

The discussion which took place in this body to which I referred, and which the Senator from New York has more distinctly called the attention of the Senate to, was on a proposition far less broad in its scope, and if that proposition were an objectionable one, this it does seem to me is in a very much greater degree. I regret that it has been offered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the words "26th instant." It seems to me that we are spending time upon a matter that we do not practically differ at all about. If we adjourn from to-morrow until the 26th instant with a general understanding that we shall then adjourn to the 29th instant, and that on the 29th instant we shall adjourn to January 2, I think it will be obeyed by what members of the Senate are present as one of the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But suppose there is no quorum?

Mr. MORRILL. I have no idea that there will be a quorum, but I have also the same faith that the point of the absence of a quorum will not be raised after a general understanding has been had that the Senate proposes to adjourn from time to time and to transact no business here between this and the 2d of January. I am very sure from what I have heard from different members that there will not be a quorum here for the next ten or twelve days. Quite a number of Senators are away on committees, and it has been even difficult for the last week to obtain a quorum in the last hours of the day's session. I know of a considerable number that are proposing to visit their homes during the holidays at Christmas and New Year's, so that I have not the slightest idea that there is going to be a quorum here during the next week; but I think that the object of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island can be accomplished and the purpose of all Senators can be realized by just adopting the first branch of this resolution and then by a general understanding we shall reach the same conclusion on each of the days mentioned in that part of the resolution which I propose to have stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope this matter will be continued until disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the resolution.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the report of the committee of conference which has been received from the House be concurred in. I send the report to the desk and ask that the Senate concur.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 4124, to provide for the expenses of certain special committees, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 1 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of "30" insert "35" and add at the end of the section amended the following:

"And the Clerk of the House shall pay such parts of the sum above appropriated as the chairmen of the said committees respectively shall, in writing, direct for the purposes aforesaid to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, who shall, as soon thereafter as practicable, make report, in writing, to the House of the manner in which the sums thus paid to him have been expended, accompanied with vouchers in detail; which report and vouchers, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts of the House, shall be deemed a sufficient settlement of his accountability for the money thus paid to him; and any unexpended balance remaining in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms after such settlement shall be paid by him into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the fund for which it was appropriated."

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 2 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "30" insert "35," and the House agree to the same.

WM. WINDOM,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WM. S. HOLMAN,
J. D. C. ATKINS,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood that the difference between the two Houses was in the amount of money which the Senate thought proper to appropriate for the use of its own committees. Is that so?

Mr. DAVIS. I was one of the conference committee, and the chairman of the committee is absent this morning, and at his request I ask that the report be concurred in. The difference between the two Houses was that the House originally asked $21,000 and the Senate $50,000. In conference it was agreed to make them equal: $35,000 each.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the House of Representatives and the Senate are both engaged in certain investigations, investigations which are of the highest importance and which exercise the highest powers of the two Houses, powers which, I think, have sometimes been abused in both Houses. The House of Representatives required a certain sum of money, in the judgment of the House, to carry on its investigation. I hope that all that the House requires will be voted, even if we think it is too much. They are responsible to their constituents and responsible to themselves. I also hope that the Senate will insist on having all that its committee thinks proper. I think it is almost necessary to the independency of the two Houses that, if they are to exercise these great powers, they should have whatever means each House may think proper to carry these powers into effect. I would never vote to restrict the House of Representatives in any amount which it requires to carry on its own investigations, nor will I vote to submit to any such restriction on the part of the Senate. If the House thinks it is not fair that the Senate should ask for a greater amount than it asks itself, then let it raise its amount it it sees fit, but not cut ours down.

I hope that the report will not be agreed to, but that, giving the House of Representatives all the money that it requires to carry on its investigations, we shall demand the same for ourselves.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator from Rhode Island has stated, that the Senate originally asked more than the House, and after a full conference there was no special disagreement, but it was concluded that the amount the House had asked was too small, and it was agreed unanimously on the part of the Senate that $35,000, probably, would be a proper amount, and that was, as I understand, after a consultation on the part of the chairman of the Senate conferees, who is now absent, with the chairman of our investigating committee. I heard no particular claim that the Senate had not a right to ask for what they wanted. That question did not arise in the committee. I hope no obstacle will now be put in the way of adopting the report, because both sets of committees, the committees of the Senate and of the House, are out, and as I understand the only money they have with which to pay their expenses has been advanced by the Sergeants-at-Arms of the respective Houses, and both are in need at once, as I understand, of the appropriation. One of the Sergeants-at-Arms has said to me that there is no money to answer the wants of the committees. It was said in conference that if there should be a further sum necessary on the part of the Senate it could be easily asked for by resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the reason why the Senate committee agreed to advance the sum from $21,000 to $35,000 for the House was because the conference committee representing the House asked for it, and if it asked for one hundred thousand dollars I think our committee should have given it. I think each House can be trusted to manage its own expenses, the cost of its own committees, and its own investigations, and since the Senate asked for the sum of $50,000, I shall not vote to take anything less.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. I was notified that I was appointed on the conference, but I presume I was not from the fact that I never received any notice from the committee to meet with them. I should like to ask the Senator if they had any information from the Committee on Privileges and Elections as to the amount required.

Mr. DAVIS. It is true, as the Senator from Illinois has said, that he was one of the conference committee appointed, but he was not present.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not present from the fact that I was not notified.

Mr. DAVIS. But the Senator was unwell, we understood.

Mr. LOGAN. I was unwell, but the committee perhaps might have met at my room as conveniently as at some other room. I make no point on that, however. I only say I know nothing about it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator's further question. I am not able to speak for the chairman of that committee, with whom I agreed; but when we agreed he spoke for himself, as I understood, and for the Senator from Illinois. That is to say, in committee we thought the Senator from Illinois would agree with us; but that is a matter of speculation only. What information the chairman had from the Committee on Privileges and Elections I have no knowledge. I only know that as he was obliged to be absent to-day, and thought it important that the report should be agreed to, he asked me when it came over from the House to move concurrence.

Mr. LOGAN. I make no point as far as I myself am concerned. I have nothing to say on that account. I do not know that I could have met with the committee. I only said that I had received no notice of its meeting. That, of course, will have no effect on the report, but I desire to say that I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations. Whether the Senator from West Virginia was present then or not, I will not now state, but my impression is that he was. I was delegated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to appear before the Committee on Appropriations. I did so appear, and made the statement of that committee as to the amount required. I was asked the question whether the committee had considered the question, and I replied they had, and that they had asked for the smallest amount they thought they could get along with, and this was the unanimous statement of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I made that report to the Committee on Appropriations. This subsequent action I know nothing about. I only state the facts.

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps I ought to state that I was consulted by the Senator from Minnesota not now in his seat [Mr. WINDOM] on this matter, and told him that I was satisfied that the amount of $35,000 was not sufficient, but that there was an immediate demand for money, and perhaps it would be as well to take this appropriation now, but with the understanding that more would probably be asked for. We cannot well afford to delay this appropriation bill any longer, and as a disagreement in regard to this conference report would probably result in such delay, I suppose we had better take it. I do not believe it will be sufficient, and I concur entirely in the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island that either House should have such an amount appropriated as in the judgment of that House may be necessary. I think this is due to the courtesy between the two Houses and due to the full exercise of the powers with which each House is invested.

Mr. DAVIS. As the Senator from Indiana has said, he had a conversation with the chairman of the conference committee, and as the Senator is chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I supposed that the report met with his concurrence. Therefore I hope that the report will be agreed to; and as was said in committee, or at least in the Committee on Appropriations, if there should be any further sum necessary it can be asked for and there will be no particular objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that I had no knowledge of the chairman of the committee having any conference on this subject.

Mr. MORTON. That was within a day or two.

Mr. LOGAN. I only repeated what I was delegated to state to the Committee on Appropriations. I did convey to them the unanimous request of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee of conference might well have an understanding that if any further sums were wanted they should be asked for; and I suppose they could be asked for without any such understanding. I do not suppose that the committee of conference could have any understanding that the sums asked for should be granted.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator did not misunderstand me. I said that there was something said of that, not that there was an understanding on the subject in the Committee on Appropriations; I do not know that it was in the conference committee. I hope the Senator did not understand me as saying that the committee agreed that it should be done. I did not mean to intimate such a thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can only say that while I am ready to grant to the House of Representatives all the money it wants for such purposes, I shall not vote for an appropriation less than what the Senate in its judgment has thought proper to ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurrence in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] respecting the adjournment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "26th instant;" so that, if amended, the resolution will read:

Resolved, That when the Senate adjourns on Friday the 22d instant it be to meet on Tuesday the 26th instant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read as it stands now.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the Senate adjourn on Friday the 29th instant, it be to meet on Tuesday the 26th instant.

Mr. MORRILL. And with the general understanding, which seems to be manifest on all sides of the Chamber, that when we meet again on the 26th we shall adjourn over until the 29th, and on the 29th to the 2d of January.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot do that without a quorum, for it would violate the Constitution worse than the other would.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course it will not be ascertained that there is no quorum, when we have this general understanding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be if I am here.

Mr. SHERMAN. It all comes to this, that any Senator can on the 26th demand a session the next day.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course; it must depend on the unanimous consent of every Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; and I hope there is not any understanding about it now, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

HAYDEN'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed 4,500 copies of Professor Hayden's annual report of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1875 and 1876; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the use of the office of the survey.

LEGAL TENDER OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that I obtained the floor when this question was before the Senate and was being discussed some days ago, and intended to submit some remarks. I have been very unwell since, and therefore am willing that the Senator from Texas shall occupy the floor in my stead this morning; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the bill (S. No. 1026) for the issue of silver coin and to make the silver dollar a legal tender, now before the committee, and also to a bill of a similar character passed by the House of Representatives within a few days. Senate bill No. 1026 was introduced by myself at the last session. I think it is very important that the Senate should take early action on the question and settle it one way or the other; and without submitting any views on the question, more than a general statement, my views concur with the action of the House to a certain extent; that is that the old silver dollar should be made a legal tender and be recoined.

I desire now to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee at what time he thinks it will be likely the committee can report this bill or some bill to the Senate of the United States for their action? I was not with the committee at the last meeting for the reason that I was not well enough to be there. At the meeting before I was present, and without saying anything about what transpired I suggested this matter myself, and something was said in reference to a report of a committee or commission appointed on the subject. But inasmuch as I feel a great interest in this measure and desire to urge it at all times that I can before the Senate, I wish to know prior to the adjournment if there is any probability of early action by the committee in presenting the question to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only state to the Senator that the committee have not yet had an opportunity to consider the question and have been delayed somewhat by the fact that the silver commission, as it is called, has made no report on the subject. I am informed in a general way that they will be able to make a report soon. As a matter of course the subject is pending before the Committee on Finance and will be promptly acted upon after the adjournment; but how soon I do not know, certainly at an early period of the session. I am in favor of very speedy action. Whether my views agree with those of the Senator or not will be developed hereafter; but I can assure him, I think, that immediately after the adjournment, so far as the Committee on Finance are concerned, they will be ready to act on this question, especially if in the mean time the silver commission should make their report. It seems to me they ought to make their report before we take any final action.

Mr. LOGAN. I feel myself that that is very proper, but I do not see the chairman of that commission present, nor do I propose to find any fault with their action—I have no right to do so—but I do desire to say that I think it very important that that commission should report, and report at a very early day, if the Committee on Finance is waiting for the report of the silver commission, so called, unless they intend to make a report so voluminous that it will never be read, and if they do, action might as well be had without it. If they intend to make a report that can be read during this session, I hope they will make it as soon as possible, for the reason that if the report is not made until late in the session in all probability there will be no action on the question. I deem it a question of as much importance as any that is before the country now, and the action of the Senate on it is very important to the country in view of the action of the House of Representatives.

I do not desire to be understood as casting any reflection whatever upon the commission, but I merely say what I do in order that they may be urged to make their report as speedily as possible, because that certainly was contemplated by the action of the Senate when they were appointed and required to report at this session.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry as to the eligibility of J. W. Watts as an elector for the State of Oregon and the circumstances attending the appointment of electors in that State.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, yesterday evening, in the discussion of the resolution presented by the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] among other things, said:

I am very certain that, if Governor Hayes should become satisfied, or if I should become satisfied, so far as my action may bear on this question—I do not know that it will—that Governor Hayes did not receive the honest vote of a State or that he did not have a fair majority of the votes legally cast, he would not desire the electoral vote of any of the disputed States. If it should be clear that in South Carolina, or Florida, or Louisiana Governor Hayes did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at the election in either of those States, I would not have him. God forbid that he should—accept the office of President of the United States with such a conviction upon his conscience. Any man who would do it would be dishonored before men and before God.

I was very greatly rejoiced to hear that utterance from the Senator from Ohio, and I will state that if it should be clear that in South Carolina, or Florida, or Louisiana, Governor Tilden did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at the election in either of those States, I would not have him—God forbid that he should—accept the office of President of the United States with such a conviction upon his conscience. Any man who would do it would be dishonored before men and before God.

In a very grave question like this, of the very deepest concern to the whole American people, it is a matter of infinitely more concern that the vote should be fairly and legally counted than the result of that count. What is now of the utmost consequence to the peace, prosperity, and well-being of the country is that such a course should be taken by the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral vote as to convince the American people that the count has been fair, honest, honorable, and lawful. If there is anything for which the American people are specially noted, it is for fair play. What the people now want is a fair and honest count of the vote. Whatever the result of such a count may be is a matter of secondary importance. "Fair play and no cheating around the board" is what is demanded.

Mr. President, I hope that every Senator in this body and every member of the House will come up in the spirit of the utterance I have quoted from the Senator from Ohio, determined to do his part toward securing a fair and honest count of the legal votes; and if we will all act with that earnest purpose to do justice, to do the very right between the contending candidates, and carry out that purpose, the American people will be satisfied with the result; but if the people of the United States come to the conclusion that, by indirect means, by trick, by chicanery, by fraud, by cunning, or by any unlawful means, a man has been declared to be President of the United States who was not fairly and honestly elected, there will be mutterings loud and deep, and it will be the severest shock to American institutions that they have ever yet received. I say, then, that we here, the trusted embassadors of the States of this Union, have in our charge a matter of the gravest concern which may have a direct bearing upon the future prosperity and well-being of this country. I trust in God that reason, love of country, and an honest desire to do right unswerved by party bias will pervade the Senate and House and the whole country until this question is settled, and if we so act, I have no doubt of a solution that will satisfy the country, and that business will instantly resume its wonted channel with ever-increasing prosperity.

Mr. President, at the opening of this debate, in the first speech in the series of speeches made by the Senator from Ohio on presenting the labors of the committee sent to the State of Louisiana and the city of New Orleans at the request of the President of the United States, he took occasion to send forth to the world his conviction, under his imprimatur of the personal integrity of the members of the returning board of Louisiana and of the legality of their work. Sir, we all know that when the work of that board and the personal character of the members of that board are vouched for by a citizen of the distinguished reputation of the Senator from Ohio, necessarily that indorsement will have its weight and its influence. That the Senator was sincere in the statement that they were entitled to and enjoyed as much respect for their personal character and standing as any Senators on this floor, I do not gainsay; but it is a question of judgment, and upon a question of judgment honest men may differ.

So far as I am personally concerned, I do not propose to pass any judgment based on personal knowledge upon the honesty or dishonesty of those men who constituted the returning board of the State of Louisiana, but it is a part of the history of the country, and as such I have a right to refer to it, that during the days of reconstruction Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan was sent by the Government to the city of New Orleans as the military commander of the department composed of the States of Louisiana and Texas for the purpose of carrying out and executing the reconstruction acts. At that time, 1867, the present chairman of the returning board of the State of Louisiana, J. Madison Wells, was governor of that State. It is part of the history of this country, published to the world by Lieutenant-General Sheridan, that J. Madison Wells, then governor of the State of Louisiana, was by him removed from that high position because he was an impediment to reconstruction; and in support of that charge, for which he removed him, General Sheridan said he was a dishonest man and surrounded himself by political tricksters, and that he, General Sheridan, could not discharge the duties which he was sent to the State of Louisiana to discharge with such a man in office.

That, I say, is the opinion of General Sheridan. Now, General Sheridan is a man of distinguished reputation in this country. The Senator from Ohio is in like manner a man of distinguished reputation. Here we have two men of the same party, both occupying honorable positions, directly differing as to the character for integrity of the chairman of the returning board of the State of Louisiana. And it was not a mere idle utterance of General Sheridan; it was not simply something to put in a newspaper for general publication, but it was an official act. That utterance was given by him to the President as the reason for the removal of Mr. Wells, and he was removed from the governorship of Louisiana for the reasons assigned by Lieutenant-General Sheridan.

So far so good. There I have the Senator from Ohio on one side and the Lieutenant-General of the Army on the other side in respect to the character of Mr. Wells. But the Senator goes further and states in respect to this same returning board:

A committee of the House of Representatives, having power to do it in the investigation of the election of a member of the House and also in the investigation of the Louisiana election generally, held that they made a mistake of law. They construed it that they had power to act in excluding votes when there was no formal complaint or protest made by the officers who held the election. The committee set aside the action of the board to that extent for the purpose of founding a compromise in Louisiana, but at the same time they certified to the honorable character and general good conduct of the board, and the only difference was in regard to a legal opinion, and the chairman of that committee the other day in debate in the other House, to which we may refer as part of the history of the times, repeated again, and I am sorry I have not now his language before me, that that committee never did arraign the returning board for personal misconduct or arraign its legality. They acknowledge its legality. It was a conceded fact.

Mr. President, the committee to which the Senator refers was a special committee appointed by the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress, of which Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, was the chairman.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Texas will allow me there, (because it may perhaps save me from further remarks at another stage,) I will now state to him the exact condition of that committee. I was substantially correct in my statement last evening, and I will now state it more precisely, because I have it from Mr. HOAR himself. That committee, I believe, was organized upon the motion of Mr. HOAR, and was composed of seven members. Instead of going in a body, the whole seven, to New Orleans to witness the inauguration of the State government, they sent three gentlemen, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Potter, as a subcommittee. That subcommittee returned with their report, and it is probably from that report that the Senator is about to read. At any rate that was the report of the subcommittee, not of the majority of the whole committee. That report was communicated by the committee, not indorsed, but simply communicated to the House as the report of the subcommittee. That is the information given to me by Mr. HOAR. Afterward the committee, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon it, did undertake to go and did go down to New Orleans, Mr. HOAR, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. FRYE, and perhaps some one else—Mr. Marshall, I believe. At any rate, the other members of the committee who had not participated with the subcommittee went down.

Mr. BAYARD. To settle the accuracy of the Senator, I will state that the committee was composed of seven members and was represented by a subcommittee consisting of Messrs. Phelps, FOSTER, and Potter. When they came back their report was joined in and signed by Mr. Marshall, making four of the seven who signed their report. That will appear on reference to the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know how that may be; but at any rate the rest of the committee, four in number, went to New Orleans and there made what I always speak of, and spoke of yesterday, as the report of the committee, the report signed by HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE, which led to the compromise arrangement made in Louisiana. When I speak of the report of the committee, I hope my friend will not quote the first document on me. He may comment on it; but that was not what I meant by "the report of the committee." I meant the paper signed by Mr. HOAR, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. FRYE.

Mr. BOGY. The report of the minority. The other was the majority report.

Mr. MAXEY. I am very glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Ohio, and I think I know something of the transaction myself. The report from which I propose to read is Report No. 101, made to the Forty-third Congress, second session, by "Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, from the select committee on the condition of the South," as follows:

Mr GEORGE F. HOAR, on behalf of the special committee on that portion of the President's message relating to the condition of the South, reports as follows:

In pursuance of the order of the full committee, of December 22, a special committee of three visited New Orleans, and proceeded with an investigation, the result of which they report to the general committee as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MAXEY. Now comes in their report. Then I will go on to show that this report, from which I propose to read, is not limited to the report of the subcommittee Hon. CHARLES FOSTER, William Walter Phelps, and Clarkson N. Potter, but it is the report of the whole committee, as you will see by this. Going on and embodying in the report made by Mr. HOAR to the House the report of the subcommittee made by the subcommittee to the general committee, Mr. HOAR adds this:

The evidence on which the subcommittee base their conclusions not yet being written out, will be submitted hereafter, if it shall be deemed desirable. The committee thereupon voted to adopt the report, and also to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the same be printed and recommitted.

For the committee:

GEO. F. HOAR, Chairman.

It appears here that the testimony was not at that time written out, and for the reason, I take it, that the report and the evidence should go hand in hand this report was recommitted, and the testimony having subsequently been published, (three hundred and forty-one pages,) that was put out as a part of the report of the committee, and, this document being marked Report No. 101, that containing the evidence was marked Report No. 101, part 2. Therefore the evidence referred to by Mr. HOAR as not at that time having been written out was, after this recommittal, published along with the report as part of the report, and the two were together.

Mr. DAWES. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, I am trying to make a connected argument on this subject.

Mr. DAWES. I rose in reference to the report of Mr. HOAR. Perhaps there is a point upon which the Senator will give me a little light.

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether after this subcommittee's report was taken by the whole committee, and laid before the House and printed, and then recommitted, the committee, with Mr. HOAR at its head, did not visit Louisiana, and make a full report to the House of Representatives of a very different character? I make inquiry as to the fact.

Mr. MAXEY. I think there was another report made.

Mr. DAWES. Upon that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I promise not to interrupt him again. It is very common, as the practice is in this body and the other body, for committees to report a document to be printed and recommitted. The recommitting and printing does not commit the committee to what is reported and printed.

Mr. DAWES. The only word upon which the Senator from Texas bases his remark that the Representative from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, and his colleagues spoke through that report, is the word "adopted." They took the word "adopted" as a way to express the fact that they received from their subcommittee this report and ordered it to be printed for information and recommitted that the whole committee might still have control of it. After that the whole committee, as a committee, went to New Orleans and reviewed the whole subject and came back and made a report as a committee, not as a subcommittee, but a report as a committee. I think the Senator from Texas, if he desires to do exact justice to the committee as a committee, should turn to the leaves of that report, which is the report of the committee, and there he will find what the committee meant to be responsible for as a committee.

Mr. MAXEY. The report which I read is report No. 101 of the Forty-third Congress, second session, and is signed "GEO. F. HOAR, chairman."

The report to which I presume the Senator from Massachusetts refers was subsequent to the one I am referring to, and after, as I understand it, the return of Messrs. HOAR, FRYE, WHEELER, and I believe Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Marshall united in the report of the majority with Messrs FOSTER, Phelps, and Potter, and the report to which the Senator refers was a minority report, but, as I insist, does not do away with the "adoption" of the report I refer to. This report which I read is reported as having been adopted by the general committee and is reported "For the committee;" and signed "GEO. F. HOAR, chairman;" and it embodies within it the report of the subcommittee, Honorables CHARLES FOSTER, William Walter Phelps, and Clarkson N. Potter. Following that, the next report is a report from the majority of the committee on the state of the South, marked "majority report No. 261." That is signed by CHARLES FOSTER, William Walter Phelps, Clarkson N. Potter, and Samuel S. Marshall. The next report is the report of a portion of the special committee, which is a minority report, as will be seen by the names signed by "GEO. F. HOAR, WM. A. WHEELER, WM. P. FRYE," a minority of the committee. This I presume is the report the Senator refers to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. MAXEY. I desire further to say in that connection that the majority report distinctly states, signed, as I have stated, by FOSTER, Phelps, Potter, and Marshall, that—

The undersigned, a majority of the Committee on the state of the South, respectfully report that they cannot agree to the report made to the committee by Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE.

Mr. DAWES. Now, if I do not trouble the Senator too much, I desire to ask him if he does not do my colleague in the House injustice when he undertakes to make him responsible for those views submitted to the other branch by those other gentlemen who say that they do not agree with the opinions to which Mr. HOAR himself placed his signature, and for which he is responsible. This is all I desire to say. I simply desire to have my colleague set right.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not intentionally do Mr. HOAR injustice. The character and standing of Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, as I am advised and believe, is that of an honorable gentleman, but I take the reports as I find them, and I beg to say that, high as the character of Mr. HOAR is, it is in no respect higher, he is no more a trusted republican than Mr. CHARLES FOSTER or than Mr. William Walter Phelps, nor is it higher than that of the democrats, Mr. Potter and Mr. Marshall; and I have read from the report of Messrs. FOSTER, Phelps, Potter, and Marshall from the report of the subcommittee incorporated in a report made by Mr. HOAR, as chairman, and which he states in his report was adopted by the full committee. Certainly the testimony of these gentlemen is as good as the testimony of the chairman of that committee. Certainly the testimony of the majority of that committee is as reliable before the country as the testimony of the minority. As I said before, I have simply stated the facts that this report which I hold in my hand was reported by Mr. HOAR, signed by him as chairman of that committee, and in it he states that the committee "thereupon voted to adopt the report and also to report the same to the House, with the recommendation that the same be printed and recommitted." I think the words mean what they say. The reason why it should be recommitted I have stated; that he had said in the report that the testimony had not been written out, and therefore it was recommitted; and as an evidence of that fact, when the testimony was written out, it was printed as part of this document which is signed by the chairman of that committee. That is part 2 of Report No. 101.

Now, the Senator from Ohio says further that this committee "acknowledged the legality of that board." The committee say:

The law provides that this board shall consist of five persons "from all political parties." It consisted at the opening of their last session of five republicans; upon the resignation of one of whom (General Longstreet) Mr. ARROYO, a conservative, was taken to fill the vacancy. After protesting against the action of the board in secret session he resigned about the conclusion of their labors, and his place was not filled, so that, as your committee think, the law as to the constitution of the board was not complied with.

When this report was subsequently made by the majority of the committee they report the same thing, that the law was not complied with. So far, then, I think the Senator from Ohio was in error when he said that this committee said nothing in regard to the illegality of that transaction. But I want to go further. He said that the House committee when it came to the personal character of that board said nothing against it. He used this language also, "but at the same time they certified to the honorable character and general conduct of the board." Now let us see whether or not the report carries out that. On page 2 of the report the committee say:

The public sittings of the returning board were attended by the counsel of the republican and conservative State committees. Objections were received from the counsel of the respective parties to the returns from different polls. The objecting party was generally allowed to produce affidavits to support the objection, and the other party to reply by affidavits. A day was fixed when these proofs were to be closed. After these public sessions the board went into private or as they were called, executive sessions, where the proofs and matters in dispute were discussed and a decision arrived at.

I call the attention of the Senate to this:

The minutes of the board are very meager; they contain little more than a record of its meeting, going into executive session, and its adjourning, and some formal public orders. They contain no minutes whatever of the proceedings in executive session, and furnish, therefore, little light upon the findings of the board.

Now I read what refers especially to the chairman of that board, Mr. J. Madison Wells, and let us see whether or not the ideas of this committee who visited the city of New Orleans for the very purpose of ascertaining the truth in regard to the official action of these gentlemen correspond with the ideas of the Senator from Ohio.

The parish of Rapides chose three members of the Legislature. The returns elected all three conservatives. When the proofs closed, the only paper filed with the returning board was the affidavit of the United States supervisor that the election was in all respects full, fair, and free.

Mark you, three conservatives were returned, and it was sworn to by the supervisor that the election was fair, full, and free in the parish of Rapides.

It was not known in the parish that any contest existed against these members. They left their homes and proceeded to New Orleans to be present at the opening of the Legislature, no intimation of contesting their seats or objection to their election having been given by their opponents. At one of their last sessions the returning board declared all the republican members elected from that parish.

The supervisor reported the three conservatives elected. There was no contest; no paper whatever was filed except the proper paper of the supervisors; thus it went up; and it is only at the last session of the returning board that they declared all the republican members elected from that parish. Now let us see how that was accomplished, by what strange means, by what legerdemain it was that the three conservative members from the parish of Rapides were thrown out during one of the last days of their session and one of their last sessions and three republican members counted in in their place. And it will be remembered that the same four men, with the same chairman, who constituted the board to which the committee refers constitute the board now.

The committee say:

When the papers of the returning board were produced before your committee, there was found among them an affidavit by Mr. Wells, the president of the board, declaring that intimidation had existed at certain polls in that parish, and that the returns from those polls should therefore be rejected. The counsel for the democratic committee testified that they had had no opportunity to contradict the statements of this paper; that they never had seen or known of it before, and that upon an examination of the papers before the board, when the proofs closed, it was not among them. The counsel for the republican committee reserved the right to make explanation upon this point, but offered none. The affidavit was dated the —— day of December, 1874. It appeared that Governor Wells was not himself in the parish on the day of the election.

I ask honorable Senators how it was possible for an honest man to file an affidavit stating that intimidation occurred in that parish on election day when he was not in that parish on the day of the election?

And though at the opening of their first session your committee declared their intention to examine into the action of the returning board, Governor Wells never came forward as a witness.

That is one time he declined.

At the close of our proceedings leave was asked that his deposition might be given in. This was declined, and Mr. Wells was himself invited to appear before the committee, but he never came. Leave was also given for taking his testimony by commission if he desired, but was not availed of.

Thus we have opportunity after opportunity offered to the witness where the opposite party would have the power of cross-examination and the searching out of the very truth, and yet on every occasion he declined to come forward and subject himself to the rigidity of a cross-examination.

Your committee are therefore constrained to declare—

Using the word "constrained." It is the report of honest men against the interest of their own party—

Your committee are therefore constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, in rejecting these returns in the parish of Rapides and giving the seats for that parish to the republican candidates, was arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law.

I ask honorable Senators if an honorable man can knowingly do an unfair thing, and, when the subject of the act is brought directly in question, when he is invited in all the modes known to the law to come forward and give his testimony, decline to give it in any shape or manner either by personal appearance or by deposition or by commission and interrogatories.

If the committee were to go behind the papers before the board and consider the alleged charge of intimidation upon the proofs before the committee, their finding would necessarily be the same.

How? Here Mr. J. Madison Wells swears that there was intimidation, and a committee with a majority of his own party, or a subcommittee, in that clause upon examination, state that if they were required to go behind the papers before the board that their report would be the same.

It was asserted in Governor Wells's affidavit that the McEnery officials had usurped the offices of the parish, and thereby intimidated voters. Immediately after the 14th of September, when the Kellogg authorities in New Orleans were put out by the Penn authorities, certain changes took place in some of the parishes. When the news from New Orleans reached these parishes the McEnery officials demanded their places of the Kellogg officials, and they were at once given up. When the Federal Government intervened and unseated the McEnery authorities, the Kellogg officials demanded and received back their places; but in Rapides some time seems to have elapsed before the Kellogg officials took their places back; indeed, the McEnery register of deeds was still acting as such when your committee were in New Orleans, the Kellogg register never having come to reclaim the place, which was said to be worth nothing.

That is a good reason why they did not want to remove him.

Now in Rapides the Kellogg clerk was Mr. Wells's son. Having yielded his place to the McEnery competitor in September, he does not appear to have reclaimed it, and he was accordingly sent for, after the election, to come from his residence, some miles distant, to sign the returns of the election, which he did. Your committee are at a loss to see, in this action, any intimidation of Mr. Wells, still less of the electors of the parish.

And yet the affidavit of J. Madison Wells did state, although he was not there to know the truth whereof he testified, that the electors in that parish were intimidated. This is not a democratic paper that I am reading. I am perfectly willing to take the testimony of CHARLES FOSTER, William Walter Phelps, and Clarkson N. Potter in a case of this kind, or any kind—men whose reputation is known. The first two are trusted members of the republican party, and the last I know stands high in the ranks of the democratic party, and is one of the ablest lawyers that practices in the country. As to their integrity no one has brought it in question, and cannot. Then it does not make any difference to me whether it be that this is Mr. HOAR'S report or whether it is not Mr. HOAR'S report. It is the report of men as good as Mr. HOAR, and of the same political faith and order, whose business it was to go down there to investigate facts and make a report after full investigation.

I will read what they say in regard to this parish of Rapides, which they have discussed:

It so happens that that parish was taken as a sample parish of intimidation.

If they could not establish intimidation in Rapides, and that was the sample they had taken, the case failed.

Many witnesses from both parties were examined in reference to it; they show beyond question that there was a free, full, fair, and peaceable election and registration there.

And yet the president of this board, Mr. Wells, swears that there was intimidation there.

There was no evidence of any intimidation of voters practiced on the day of election, although it was asserted that intimidation of colored men before election had been effected by threats of refusal to employ them, or discharge them, if they voted the republican ticket. No evidence, either of discharge or of refusal to employ, was produced. Certain witnesses, themselves every one office-holders, testified generally to such action; but hardly any one was able to specify a single instance in which he heard of any employer so threatening or discharging any voter, or knew of any employé being so threatened or discharged. Not one single colored man throughout the entire parish was produced to testify, either to such a threat or to the execution of such a purpose, whether before or after the election.

The action of the returning board in the parish of Rapides alone changed the political complexion of the lower house, but their action in other parishes was equally objectionable.

They then go on and give the facts in regard to other parishes; but I will pass on, to save time, to De Soto:

So in the parish of De Soto, in which the returns showed a conservative elected by over 1,000 majority, it was alleged that the supervisor of registration had brought the returns to New Orleans, and had left them with a woman of bad character, who offered to produce them on payment of $1,000.

That is a place for them!

The conservative committee took legal proceedings to compel their production; but the court held that it had no jurisdiction to that end. They then caused to be produced before the board the duplicate of those returns from the office of the secretary of state, together with the tally-sheets, poll-lists, &c., filed there according to law. These duplicates corresponded exactly with the alleged result of the compiled returns which the said woman had produced; and of these alleged facts undisputed proof was also submitted to the board. Nevertheless, the board refused to count the vote for that parish.

Here is a parish which gives an unquestioned and undisputed majority of 1,000 votes. The return from that parish is placed in the hands of the supervisor and he brings those returns down to the seat of government at New Orleans, and instead of filing them where the law required them to be filed, they are turned over to a woman of bad repute who asks $1,000 for them. These facts are brought to the attention of that board, and nevertheless the board refused to make a demand for them and refused to count the vote for that parish; and yet this is a board which the Senator has seen fit here to say was composed of men as honorable as any Senators on this floor. In the conclusion upon that part of the case they say:

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

We are told that the action of this board is as binding upon the country, and is entitled to as much respect, as the court of last resort, the Supreme Court of the United States. I ask when it was that any man in all this land has ever accused the Supreme Court of the United States of arbitrary and unjust decisions? They may have decided questions about which lawyers may differ as to the true construction of the law, but so far as their action is concerned the charge of arbitrary and unjust conduct has never yet been made against that august court. An honorable man, with a knowledge of the facts, cannot act unjustly. Governor Wells when he made his affidavit in regard to the parish of Rapides should have known the truth whereof he testified. The testimony before this board shows that Governor Wells himself was not in the parish of Rapides on the day of election, and therefore that he testified in regard to a subject about which it was impossible for him to know, and which, upon investigation, the committee report turned out to be untrue. The law of evidence characterizes this kind of testimony.

I should not have troubled the Senate with making these statements and with quoting from the testimony of General Sheridan in regard to the personal character of the chairman of that board, or the testimony of these gentlemen, Messrs. FOSTER, Phelps, and Potter, in regard to the arbitrary, unjust, and illegal conduct of this board and their sharp criticism in regard to J. Madison Wells but for the fact that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] saw proper in his opening remarks upon the Louisiana matter to send forth to the world as honest men this returning board, and to further say that their action is entitled to as much credit as the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is, therefore, but just and proper that the testimony of men of his own party with equal facilities for knowing the character and integrity and the work of these men should go before the country also. They might possibly be mistaken. I cannot well see how they could upon the facts be mistaken, but at all events the Senator from Ohio has indorsed the personal integrity and official action of this board, and the committee do not.

In respect to the report of the President's committee, we know by experience that party influences and party biases sometimes warp our judgment. If the President designed to secure a perfectly reliable report from the State of Louisiana, it seems to me that it would have been more prudent and more politic and wiser to have selected representative men from both of the great political parties so that the bias or prejudice which each party might have in respect to the evidence or the facts before the board might be corrected by the other party. In this manner the truth could have been deduced and then a joint report signed by both sides would have been entirely acceptable to the American people, but it is a matter of fact that every one of those who were sent down there at the President's instance are of the same political faith as the President.

There is another point I desire to refer to. So far as my information of affairs in the State of Louisiana goes, I do not remember to have seen a single publication charging intimidation, threats, or violence toward voters on account of political sentiments during the entire canvass. So far as the publications went that fell under my observation the canvass was fairly and peaceably conducted. The first news that came up from Louisiana, undisputed so far as I know, was that the election had been absolutely fair and peaceful in every precinct in the State, yet we have now charges of intimidation whereby we have a democratic majority of nearly 9,000 wiped out and a majority of some 4,000 counted in on the other side, making a difference of about 13,000 votes. This startling fact must be fully and satisfactorily explained before the American people will believe it just. If the testimony when it comes to be examined shows it to be right and in accordance with the votes legally cast that the State of Louisiana should be counted for the Hayes electors, if it is just, if the will of the people of that State, fairly expressed through the ballot-box, was for him, then it should be so counted; and if it was for the electors for Governor Tilden then it should be counted for Tilden. Whatever may be the truth of the case the decision should be in accordance with the law and with the facts. The democratic party court the most searching investigation of the disputed returns.

The Senator from Ohio agrees to that sentiment, but his trouble seemed to be as to who had authority to make this investigation. Can any one believe for an instant that when our system of laws on the subject of elections is so jealous of the rights of the people that there are tribunals for establishing by contest the right to the smallest office in a State, from constable up to governor, it is so fatally defective that there is no constitutional and legal tribunal to determine who has received a majority of the electoral votes cast for President and Vice-President? The power to open all the certificates is, by the Constitution, in the President of the Senate, and the power to examine the votes and determine questions raised as to their validity or invalidity, and of counting what are thus ascertained to be valid legal votes, is, in my judgment, vested by the Constitution in the two Houses. My opinions about this, expressed in the debate at the last session, have undergone no change. I will say in respect to this matter in Oregon that I have no objection to the investigation. There is a difference of statement on a point of great concern between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and the governor of that State; that is to say, as to the publicity, and its extent, of the alleged ineligibility of one of the Hayes electors. The governor says:

[By telegraph to the Herald.]

SALEM, OREGON, December 7, 1876.

To the Editor of the Herald:

At your request I give you some of the grounds of my action in granting certificates to electors in Oregon.

The laws of Oregon require the governor to grant certificates to electors duly elected. In taking his oath of office the governor is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and of this State. In the election of President and Vice-President the Constitution of the United States is the paramount law. That instrument declares that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. John W. Watts, one of the electors voted for in Oregon, was on the 7th day of November holding an office of profit and trust under the United States, to wit, postmaster at Fayette, the county seat of Yam Hill County, and had so held that office for more than three years. Many more than the number of voters constituting his majority had actually passed in and out of his office on official business. His official character was generally known, and was mentioned during the political discussion of the canvass. The law was known and the fact was known rendering him disqualified to be an elector.

A protest was filed in the executive office, by prominent citizens, objecting to the issuance of a certificate to Watts, as a person disqualified, accompanied by proof of his disqualification, and demanding that the same issue to the eligible person having the next highest number of votes. A reply was filed, objecting to anything but a count of the votes, and a certificate on the count, and making no denial of the disqualifying facts. It was ruled, in the case, that where the objection to an applicant's right to receive a certificate rests upon the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed, the governor, acting under oath to support the Constitution, is bound to entertain and determine the question; not only that, but is to determine in such a way as to enforce the constitutional mandate to the extent of his executive power. It was also held that, the law and the fact being well known, the votes cast for the ineligible candidate cannot be counted for any purpose, and the eligible candidate having the next highest number of votes was duly elected. This ruling was based upon standard authorities, such as Cushing and Grant; the decisions of many courts, like the supreme court and the court of appeals of New York; the later uniform practice in the United States House of Representatives, and the great weight of English authorities, both parliamentary and judicial.

The law of Oregon providing for filling vacancies in the electoral college recognizes a vacancy only in cases where there has been an incumbent and such incumbent has died, refused to act, neglected to attend, or is otherwise absent. In this case there was no incumbent, unless the next highest candidate should take the position, and there was no vacancy which could be filled by the other members of the electoral college. The next highest candidate eligible under the Constitution of the United States was, therefore, certified to be duly elected.

L. F. GROVER,
Governor of Oregon.

The Senator from Oregon states that he made twenty-five speeches in the interest of the republican party in that State and did not hear the ineligibility of Watts mentioned. Then there is a question which, it seems to me, is proper for investigation; and, however this may result, whoever is fairly, honestly, and lawfully entitled to the disputed vote of Oregon should have it, and the same course should be pursued in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. I do not believe that philippics, that denunciations do any good here and do much harm elsewhere. We all ought to look at this from a temperate standpoint; every man ought to be controlled by reason, judgment, and common honesty; and if we come up to the work with that spirit, with the earnest purpose and desire of declaring the very truth as to who is lawfully entitled to be inaugurated my judgment about it is that everything will pass off peacefully and harmoniously, and the people will be satisfied with whomever the truth may declare as lawfully entitled by fair election, conducted by the methods of the Constitution and laws to the exalted positions of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas started out with expressing the opinion that the will of the people should be carried out, in which I fully concur. He said that the election returns should be counted fairly and squarely, and that there should be no cheating around the board; that the result should not be determined by fraud and chicanery. In all that I agree; but I should have been glad if the Senator from Texas had gone one step further and said that violence and bloodshed and intimidation before the election should not be allowed to control the result, and that returns of elections obtained by bloodshed and all manner of violence should be rejected. I think my friend from Texas ought to have said that, and he and I would then fully agree. The vote should be fairly counted, the will of the people should be expressed, and if there has been fraud in the count it ought to be corrected. If the results have been obtained by violence and murder and crimes of the darkest hue, then the fruits of these crimes should not be enjoyed. If the result in a particular parish or county has been obtained by murders, by the commission of high crimes, the party who committed those murders or countenanced them should not have the fruits. Those results should be cast out. You cannot stop to count the drops of blood. You cannot stop to count how many have been killed or how many men have been terrified or driven from the polls; but wherever it is shown that murder and these crimes have entered largely into the result of the election those results ought to be cast out. Murder is the highest crime known to the law, and neither individuals nor parties should be allowed to profit by it. I will say so long as murder is profitable so long it will be continued; so long as murder is defended and excused so long murder will be committed.

The question is not as to the character of the returning board in Louisiana. With all due respect to my friend from Texas, that is simply a voiding the issue. They may be good men or bad men; that is not the question. The question is what were the facts before them, what was the character of that election. The Senator cannot answer what has been said and what has been proven by saying that Wells is not a good man or that Anderson is not a good man. That is simply begging the question. That is not to the purpose at all.

The question is, what was the evidence before that board and what was the character of that election? [Holding up a book.] Here is a volume of testimony that has been printed. it is before the whole country. It is ignored; treated as if it had never taken place, and by an attack upon the character of the members of the returning board the whole thing is sought to be avoided. We have had instances of that before, where the defendant's counsel was instructed to attack the plaintiff's attorney. Instead of meeting this case by responding to these terrible charges that cannot be ignored, (and the time has gone by when they can be ignored, and Senators ought to understand that,) we are told that the members of the returning board were not men of good character. I am not now called to pass upon this question. I do not know what the Louisiana matter has to do with the discussion of this resolution; but it is brought here.

It is said by my friend from Texas that effect should be given to the voice of the people, and so say I. We should not let things turn on technicalities upon the great question of electing a President for the government of this nation. We should give effect to the voice of the people; we should put by small technicalities, little things that do not go to the substance.

In regard to Oregon there are in the first place two or three things which are not disputed by anybody. The first is that there is no charge of fraud in the election in Oregon. I have not heard that charge on either side. The election was admitted to be fair and honest, and it was admitted that the republicans carried that State by nearly twelve hundred majority. Now when an attempt is made to defeat the vote in that State and the voice of that people by saying that one elector was ineligible, the governor assuming to commission another man who was not elected and that man assuming to commission two electors who were not elected and thus to cast the vote of the State of Oregon, I want to apply to that State the doctrines laid down by my friend from Texas. I say we have got to trample under our feet these technicalities and tricks, to use a word I have used before, by which an attempt was made to take the electoral vote of Oregon from the republican party. Nobody respects what was done there. Even my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] with all his ability and all his eloquence, cannot make the Oregon transaction respectable. It will always stand out on the page of history solitary, bald, and hideous.

To come down to the State of Louisiana, my friend referred to the report and to attacks made upon the members of the returning board. As I said before, I shall not stop now to defend those men; that is all foreign to the question. The question is not how old they are, what their occupation is, what their character has been; but the question is as to the character of the case before them, and as to the character of the election. And here we have a vast volume of testimony.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. The remarks which I made in introducing the testimony of General Sheridan and the report of Mr. Foster, Mr. Phelps, and Mr. Potter was in answer to what had been said in regard to the personal integrity of the board by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If it was legitimate for him to indorse their personal integrity, it is unquestionably legitimate for us to show the other side of this question.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose that what General Sheridan said was true, how does that affect this question? Suppose he was mistaken, still how does it affect this question? If my friend is going to take the testimony of General Sheridan, I will read to him a passage from what General Sheridan has said, in which he states:

Number of political murders in the State of Louisiana from 1866 to 1875 were:

Killed	2,141
Wounded	2,115
Total	4,256

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Indiana is referring to that as the report of the committee. I think he will find upon an examination that it is a minority report signed alone by three republicans, whereas the majority report is signed by both republicans and democrats.

Mr. MORTON. So far as those facts are concerned which were reported upon by Judge HOAR, I believe there is but very little dispute. I simply want to say that if we are to talk about fairness of elections, we cannot ignore great crimes by which political results are brought about. If it can be shown, or if it has been shown, that the election in Louisiana was controlled by murder and violence in every form, I have to say that every such return should be cast out, and that is the great question. It is not to be dodged by attacking the plaintiff's attorney. Here is a mass of evidence laid before the board upon which it acted. There is the evidence running back through ten years, showing more than two thousand murders and more than two thousand men wounded before the year 1876 for political purposes. Louisiana has been a great slaughter-house of republicans for political purposes; and the fact cannot be dodged by talking about the plaintiff's attorney, by attacking the private character of the members of the returning board.

Here is a terrible state of facts alleged by General Sheridan; and if my friend places so much reliance upon what he has said of him let him take that statement along with the rest.

No, Mr. President, what the Senator refers to is trivial; it is not part of the res gestæ. What has been the character of the election in Louisiana? There is a volume of testimony placed on our table by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] At least it has been brought here and printed by the order of this body. I might take a single parish. I find the testimony of the coroner; I find copies of reports of coroner's juries in the single parish of Baton Rouge, eleven cases of murder in the last year, of men shot and of men hung by armed bodies of regulators; and taking this evidence altogether, it is proof of a vast mass of crime which controlled that election.

Referring to the report made by Judge HOAR in regard to Louisiana, we find that in that report he refers to the slaughter of the convention in the city of New Orleans in 1866 where nearly two hundred men were killed and wounded, unarmed and without having committed any offense. He then refers to the evidence which shows that over two thousand persons were killed and wounded in that State just prior to the presidential election of 1868. He then refers to the Colfax massacre, where nearly or quite one hundred men were murdered in cold blood in 1873. He gives the circumstances, and the whole matter is summed up by General Sheridan in the statement of between four and five thousand being killed and wounded in that State since 1866.

Whenever murder shall be condemned in the South and denounced by all parties then it will cease, but so long as it is profitable it will be continued. If elections can be carried by violence we shall have violence. Then we shall have this country Mexicanized. What we want is fair elections. If the State of Oregon has been carried fairly by the republican party it should have the vote of Oregon. If the State of Lousiana has been carried fairly by the democratic party it should have the vote of Louisiana, but if on the other hand Louisiana has been carried by violence and murder and by a repetition of the crimes that have been going on there for ten years, then it should not have the vote of Louisiana, it should not have the benefit of these crimes.

Mr. BOGY. Then does the Senator think the vote should go to Hayes without him having any votes at all?

Mr. MORTON. If the votes fairly cast were for Hayes he should have it, and those votes which were cast by fraud and violence should be thrown out.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the law of Louisiana.

Mr. MORTON. It is the law of Louisiana, and it is the law of justice. It is the law everywhere. There is a notorious republican State, republican by a large majority, and if it can or has been shown that that majority was overcome by violence, those who committed that violence should not have the benefit of it. To give them the benefit of their crime is equally against the law of God and against the law of man. There is no use now in saying that these was no crime; we do not know anything about it. It has been going on too long and the whole world knows it. Only the other day a committee of gentlemen sent down there on the part of the democratic party to watch this count were driven to admit the existence of these terrible crimes. They could not conceal them although they tried to divert the issue and place it upon immaterial matters.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, if it be true that the election in Louisiana has been carried by fraud, by murder, by the shedding of blood, by anything which would prevent a fair election from having been held, of course the vote of Louisiana should not be counted by the party that carried the election in that way; the vote of Louisiana should not be counted at all; but I have put a question to my friend from Indiana before, and I have put it to my friend from Ohio before, and they have never answered it. They cannot answer it. I say that there is no evidence of that fact besides what is found upon my friend's table, which evidence was not taken in accordance with the law of Louisiana. The law of Louisiana requires that any evidence of murder, of intimidation, of the shedding of blood, to affect the election, shall be returned within a given time, say twenty-four hours, with the return of the votes of the different parishes. That law has not been complied with, and why was it not complied with? Because the fact stands before the world that there was no intimidation and no murder and no bloodshed. The fact is beyond all controversy in the city of New Orleans among republicans and democrats that the election throughout the State of Louisiana was peaceful, and quiet, and orderly, and that these affidavits that are found in that report on the Senator's desk were of men picked up in the stews and gutters and purlieus and faubourgs of the city of New Orleans, men not known, many of them, and all of them, no doubt, perjured themselves. The law of Louisiana requires that any evidence of fraud shall be returned with the vote. That law has not been complied with. When you speak of the returning board, there is another fact, which these gentlemen cannot or dare not deny. That board after having got the evidence, after receiving the testimony before the committees that were there present, retired privately and threw out what they pleased; and to this day neither the committee of the democratic party nor my friend's committee know the vote of any parish in the State of Louisiana. They then made an aggregate return sweeping away at one dash a majority of 8,000 votes given to the democratic party and giving a majority of nearly 4,000 votes to the republican party; and that was done in secret session, no one but themselves being present.

After my friend from Ohio spoke as he did yesterday, you would suppose that the committees were present during all those investigations. I say that the two committees were present as a matter of form, a mere deception, at the opening of the proceedings; but what votes were returned, what were thrown out, and what were received beyond that nobody knows. Everything was done in secret; and that by the report of the committee that went there two years ago, composed of a majority of republicans, has been declared to be an improper way of transacting the business. The report of Mr. HOAR and his colleagues stigmatized that as being illegal and improper. The report says that the receiving of affidavits not having been returned with the votes is not allowed by the laws of Louisiana; and yet I do say as a fact which never has been contradicted, and which never can be contradicted, that when the returns of the votes of the different parishes were made there was no evidence of intimidation with them; and who can doubt for a moment if intimidation existed, if men had been shot, if murder had been committed, if all those horrid things embraced in that document had taken place, that that fact would have been returned? All these officers in the parishes of Louisiana were republicans; all the commissioners of registration and supervisors of election were republicans and the appointees of Governor Kellogg. These men, all belonging to one party, made no return of such things at the time, and made none for weeks afterward; and yet both of my friends admit that if there is evidence of fraud the vote should not be counted. The evidence is that there was fraud committed by the board; what appears in that book is not authorized by the laws of Louisiana. Neither of my friends can say that that thing was authorized by the laws of Louisiana. The law is positive that the evidence must be returned with the votes by the supervisors of registration and the commissioner of the parish. It was not done, and not being done, that board had no right to take jurisdiction; it had no right to fabricate and to create testimony which is upheld by my friend from Ohio in that able and, I will not say cunning, but most successful way that he has employed more than once on this floor. The testimony in the report upon my friend's table was not taken in accordance with the laws of Louisiana. If there has been intimidation; if there has been fraud, I am not myself in favor of receiving votes cast in that way. I have no doubt if we had a proper appreciation of the high office of President the vote of Louisiana ought to be thrown out altogether. Let it be so, and let those men, having experience, know better hereafter. Those men admit themselves that the vote was actually given for Mr. Tilden, but charge that that result was brought about by fraud, by the shedding of blood, and murder. I do not admit it; but does that prove that the vote of Louisiana should be given to the other party? Parishes were thrown out by the action of a board sitting in secret, and they dare not now appear before the committee that is in New Orleans and show what they did. They are resisting the investigation to-day, if what we see in the papers be true. Let the character of the board be what it may, good or bad, we say its action is not sustained by the law of Louisiana, and the report of a House committee composed of a majority of the republican party shows that its action is not in accordance with the law of Louisiana in declaring the result of the vote given at the last election.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the Senator from West Virginia proceeds, I desire to present the evidence which the commission to examine into the mail service have taken, and I ask that it be printed. We shall soon have the various subjects to which it relates before us and all Senators want the information which it contains. I move that the usual number be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the special committee respecting the counting of the electoral votes authorized by the resolution of the 18th instant, Messrs. EDMUNDS, MORTON, FRELINGHUYSEN, LOGAN, THURMAN, BAYARD, and RANSOM.

DEATH OF SENATOR CAPERTON.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, according to notice heretofore given I now submit two resolutions having for their object the furnishing of an opportunity for the Senate and House of Representatives to bear testimony to the character and public services of ALLEN T. CAPERTON, and ask their present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of ALLEN T. CAPERTON, late a Senator from the State of West Virginia, business be now suspended that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his private and public virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senate is again called upon to suspend its ordinary proceedings, that it may in a proper manner mark its respect for one of its former members whose death it laments; to testify to his private worth and public virtues and give expression to its sorrow.

Scarcely a session of this body passes but it is invaded by death and some familiar face, some associate, is summoned hence and called to rest forever from all earthly care.

In my single term of service here, yet incomplete, the painful duty now upon us has been, alas! too frequently performed.

We have followed to the grave and shed the tear of affection over some of the ablest and most distinguished men of our day and time.

Our late President of the Senate, Vice-President Wilson, the nation's and people's friend; the learned and gifted Sumner; Ex-President Johnson, self-taught and self-educated, who by force of energy and native abilities hewed his way from the humblest walks of life up to the executive chair of the nation; the patriot governor, Buckingham; the amiable and affectionate Ferry; and the earnest, able, and fearless Davis, all have passed away.

In this instance it has fallen to the lot of West Virginia to mourn and render up one of her ablest, best, and truest sons.

Toward the close of the last session of the Senate, prolonged as it was into the late summer, when the heat was most oppressive and fatigue and exhaustion rested upon all, after but a brief illness of organic disease of the heart, on the 26th day of last July, death found Mr. CAPERTON at his post of duty.

It is not my purpose on this solemn occasion to pronounce any studied words of praise and commendation over my friend and dead colleague, believing that the best eulogy upon so noble a character will be the plain and simple story of his life.

ALLEN T. CAPERTON was descended from an old Virginia family, and was born at Union, Monroe County, Virginia, (now West Virginia,) November 21, 1810. His ancestors on the paternal side were English and on the maternal Scotch, a commingling of nationalities that has produced some of the greatest men of our country. His great-grandparents on both sides were among the earliest settlers on the head waters of the Kanawha, then overrun by hostile Indians; and the fact that his grandmother was captured by savages, her infant child butchered before her eyes, and she detained in captivity for four years, will give some idea of the courage it took and the dangers that had to be encountered in opening to civilization that fertile and beautiful mountain region.

Hugh Caperton, the father of the late Senator, was a man of great ability, high character, and commanding influence in the section of Virginia where he resided. He represented his district in the Thirteenth Congress and was the intimate friend and admirer of the great statesmen Clay and Webster, and other leaders of the whig party, to which he belonged.

Mr. CAPERTON passed the earlier years of his life at the home of his father, near Union, and at that village received the rudiments of his education. At the age of fourteen he went to Huntsville, Alabama, to attend school, making the long journey on horseback in company with an elder brother. He afterward attended the University of Virginia, and completed his education at Yale College in 1832, graduating seventh in a class of fifty-three at the age of twenty-two. In college he was noted, as in after-life, for his studious habits, industry, and good deportment; though modest and reserved, he was popular with his fellow-students and beloved and esteemed by his professors.

After leaving college he studied law under the late Judge Briscoe Baldwin, at Staunton, Virginia; was admitted to the bar in 1834, and commenced the practice of his profession at his native town. His natural ability, eloquence, and close attention to business soon secured for him a prominent position as a lawyer, and his practice rapidly extended throughout the southwestern portion of the State. He was not, however, long permitted to confine himself solely to his professional duties, but in 1841, at the solicitation of his friends and neighbors, he took part in politics and was elected to the house of delegates of Virginia, and in 1844 to the senate, after which, until 1850, he was at various times a member of both houses of the State Legislature. In 1848 he was a member of the national convention that nominated President Taylor. Although elected to the Legislature at an early age and at a time when some of the ablest and most brilliant men of the State were members, he soon advanced to the front rank and gained an enviable reputation throughout the State as a useful legislator and a ready and forcible debater.

His service in the Legislature was marked by his untiring efforts and best exertions in favor of every measure looking to the progress and prosperity of the State generally, but more particularly to the opening up and development of the vast resources of the portion he represented. All propositions for internal improvements and public works found in him a zealous and energetic supporter, and he was held in the highest esteem by all parties.

A newspaper correspondent, speaking of him in 1858, says:

A. T. CAPERTON, of Monroe, is a whig and has long enjoyed the confidence of the whole people of his section. He has never been defeated for office. MR. CAPERTON is one of the handsomest men in the Legislature, the ablest member of his party on the floor, and would make a valuable and useful member of Congress.

During all this time, notwithstanding his service in the Legislature and the interest he took in politics, he not only continued the practice of his profession with success, being engaged in almost every important suit in his section of the State, but found time to devote to agriculture and stock-growing, of which he was very fond, and was reputed among the most successful in the State.

He was also the active friend and supporter of nearly all important enterprises projected and put in operation in the southwestern portion of Virginia.

He was one of the most influential directors in the James River and Kanawha Canal, looked upon in that day and time, as now, a work of national importance, its object being to connect the waters of the East and West, and furnish means of transportation between the distant sections of the country.

In 1850 and 1861 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention of Virginia, and, like many prominent members of the whig party in the South, was a conservative-union man, and opposed secession until the commencement of actual hostilities, when he felt, as many others did, that his duty was to link his fortunes with those of his State. In 1862 he was elected by the Legislature of Virginia as a member of the Confederate States senate, which position he filled until the close of the war in 1865; after which he returned to his home, accepted the result of the war in good faith, and resumed the practice of his profession, devoting much of his time and energies, as in the past, to the opening up and developing the resources of West Virginia, particularly adverting and bringing to the attention of foreign capitalists her fine coal, timber, and grazing lands; and in this direction he accomplished much and his efforts were crowned with reasonable success.

On the 17th of February, 1875, after a spirited contest, he was almost unanimously elected a member of this body to succeed Hon. Arthur I. Boreman, and took his seat on the 4th of March following. His election was received with general satisfaction throughout the State. He brought to the Senate great strength of character, matured experience in public affairs, sound judgment, and an accurate knowledge of the history of the Government and the necessities of the country, and particularly the South. He had the liveliest appreciation of the responsibility resting upon a Senator and his duty to the General Government and his State. He recognized in the amplest manner that old issues were dead and that a glorious and prosperous future awaited the whole country if good feeling could be restored between the sections. His greatest concern and deepest anxiety was over the unsettled condition of our political affairs, and had he lived I have no doubt his voice would have been raised and energies exerted in behalf of peace and harmony.

Such is a brief outline of the early life and public services of my departed colleague.

For thirty-five years, it may be said, he was constantly under the eye of the public, filling many important positions of trust and confidence to which he had been elevated by the partiality of his neighbors and fellow-citizens. And during this long term of public service, quite an ordinary life-time, embracing and covering as it does a period as important, stirring, and exciting as has occurred in our history as a country, I have the pride and pleasure of recording that his conduct and character was so pure, so high, and so elevated that neither suspicion nor taint ever rested on either; and in all of his official acts and doings, in his professional and business dealings, he did his duty well, wronged neither state or individual, and was uniformly just and honorable.

He was a man of scholarly attainments, positive character, fixed principles, and strong convictions, a despiser of all tricks and narrow doings, a sound lawyer, modest and reserved, though a ready debater, thoroughly versed in the history of the country and politics, a lover of the Constitution and a close student of its wise provisions; all of which was supplemented by a large experience with men and affairs. Thus thoroughly equipped by nature and cultivation he came up to our best ideas of an American Senator and statesman.

The term of service of Senator CAPERTON as a member of this body, less than two years, was so short that there was scarcely sufficient time for his associates to know him well and understand his noble character; but I believe I am authorized in saying that, even brief as it was, he enjoyed the esteem and respect of all, and none was more dearly beloved.

Of commanding presence and dignified deportment he inspired the respect of all with whom he came in contact. He was eminently social. Possessed of rare conversational powers and a cultivated mind, amiable disposition, and genial manner, warm-hearted and affectionate, he drew around and cemented to him friends wherever he went. He made but few speeches in the Senate, but when he did speak he brought to the subject careful and accurate thought, close research, and sound judgment. His highest ambition, best purpose, and most earnest wish were that the estrangement growing out of our late unfortunate war should forever disappear and be replaced by harmony and good feeling between the people of the whole Union, believing when this happy end should be attained there was a brilliant and prosperous future before the country.

He was an earnest advocate of internal improvements on the part of the General Government, feeling that if Congress could inaugurate and carry out a proper system it would prove of incalculable benefit to the country and help to bring about the harmony and friendly feeling between the people of the States which he so much desired and believed necessary to the perpetuity of our free institutions.

His speeches on the Centennial and river and harbor bills, delivered during the last session of Congress, breathe a spirit of progress and patriotism and hope for the future.

But it was at his own home, in the midst of his neighbors and friends of a lifetime and in the quiet sacredness of the domestic circle, where he was best known, that he was loved most.

A fond and affectionate husband, a generous and loving father, he enjoyed the devotion of his family.

It was my lot to be one of the number who accompanied his remains from this capital to their final resting-place at his home, and his popularity and the affection cherished for his memory were marked by the general grief and gloom that pervaded all classes as we drew nearer to the end of our sad journey. His death was not only a great loss to his State and the country, but particularly to his family and the community in which he lived. He was endeared to all classes, and in the long procession of relatives, friends, and neighbors that followed his remains to their last resting-place, among the grief-stricken and those who stood nearest the grave, were some of his former slaves.

Although cut off in the midst of his usefulness and at a time when he could apparently do the most good for his country and State, we bow with better submission to this dispensation of a divine Providence, believing and knowing that society, the times, and the age were better for his having lived.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I should be unmindful of the strong promptings of friendship, indifferent to duty, and unjust to the memory and many sterling qualities of head and heart of the late Senator CAPERTON, if I did not add something to what has just been so appropriately said by his surviving colleague. I first met the late Senator when he appeared to enter upon his duties here in March, 1875. From that time until his death our relations, official and personal, for those theretofore strangers to each other, were more than usually intimate. Among other duties, he was assigned to the committee of which I was then made chairman, a committee (Claims) where he found hard work, drudgery, need of patience, care, thoughtfulness, watchfulness, and where, certainly equal to any other in this body, there is abundant opportunity to test the fidelity of its members to duty and their ability to dispose of the many perplexing and important questions arising. And I am sure that I but express the united judgment of his associates there when I say that no man could have been more faithful, painstaking, or attentive to every question arising, nor more solicitous to do even and exact justice to the claimant and the Government, than our late colleague.

In the committee-room, as in the Senate, he was the same affable, courteous, polite, and courtly gentleman, and in both, as in private and social life, never in an unseemly or untimely manner pressing his views, never seeming to obtrude his opinions in the spirit of the determined and obstinate antagonist, but mildly, pleasantly, and yet with a firmness which satisfied you that he knew his ground, had studied it well, and that his convictions or conclusions were the result of thought and care, and not of passion, prejudice, or other than what was to him the very right of the case. He could listen to and take part in fair and just argument; to aught else than this and the very law and justice of the matter presented, he ever turned a deaf ear.

Senator CAPERTON was educated at Yale, and had as his classmates and fellow-students, among others, John and Wellington Gordon, of Virginia; Rhett and Rutledge, of South Carolina; Shorter, of Georgia, as well as others who were afterward of distinguished prominence in their several States and in the nation. One of these (Hon. Henry Sherman, now of this city) says of him as a student that "He was of fine personal appearance, courteous in his address, of high moral character, and very popular among his fellow-students." And following him through after-life this friend adds that "He was eminent in his profession, prominent in his State; in his business he was a man of large conscientiousness and high-toned honor and integrity. I frequently found him, after he entered upon his duties in the Senate, very late at night, pouring over voluminous records and laboring with the utmost care and industry. His laborious and persistent attention to business, in my judgment, shortened his days."

In private life, as we have already heard, the goodness and greatness of the late Senator appeared in the most conspicuous manner. The man who—as another friend, who was for years brought into the closest and most intimate relations to him, in a letter now before me says—I say the man who, "tender and guileless as an infant himself, could and did attach to him the affections of the young and the poor, enter into their plans and pleasures, identify himself with their interests, who had the almost sublime adornment of wife and children, and who returned this with a devotion attracting the attention of all who knew him, who despised a little thing beyond expression, who with that vigor of language of which on such occasions he was complete master denounced all things little and mean and wicked, who ever took an interest unequaled in the struggles and trials of those in distress and trouble, who as a man was exemplary in all the relations of life"—such a man, I repeat, could not be otherwise than good; and greatness most logically and certainly followed, for goodness leads to greatness; goodness is greatness.

Senator CAPERTON belonged to that school of politics which taught the power and constitutionality of the General Government to engage in a general system of internal improvement.

Entertaining these convictions, he was, as his public life will show, ever the most active supporter in his own State and in the nation of all those measures which tended to the material development, by a system of internal improvement or otherwise, of the old State which he loved so well, and of any and almost all schemes under the patronage and fostering care of the General Government which in his opinion might contribute in any manner to its growth, greatness, and material prosperity. On this subject or on these matters he never, as far as I can learn, and as his public record will attest, had any the least constitutional scruples. And yet it is perhaps not strange, in view of his associations, education, and from his devotion to his State, that he could quite naturally incline to side with his State in the late unpleasant and deprecated struggle. Hence he took a prominent part in that contest for what he thought were the rights of his State and his people. And yet the sincerity of the man and his convictions, his adherence to his principles as to the powers of the Government, and his, as I must believe, patriotic devotion to the Union and country in whose service he was engaged at the time of his death, is well shown by what he said to a near friend in almost his last hours as given to me when, referring to his public life, he said, "You know the influences under which I have lived and been brought up and strengthened in the views of States' rights, consistent with which I could not do otherwise than I did. But," he added, "I am clear of those views now, and I accepted my present position with a firm determination to support the Union and Government of the United States, and my first ambition is to enforce upon the people of the State which I represent my conviction that our greatest good is to make the State of West Virginia as great a State in the Union as the Old Dominion of Virginia was in her palmy days."

Such, Mr. President and Senators, were some of the characteristics and virtues, as they impressed me, of our late colleague; such almost his last words. Standing by his tomb and admonished by the occasion, our present surroundings, the scenes here enacted each day, how we should each be led to reflect upon the vanity and littleness of all human ambitions and aspirations! How fitting that we should for the passing hour, and indeed for time, bury the asperities, the bitterness, the criminations and recriminations of party and political strife, and upon their tomb build higher and still higher a love and devotion to that Union which is the only sure hope of our present and future greatness; that Union which should know neither sections nor parties; that country which our deceased colleague was, as I believe, in his service here, seeking to make stronger and better and purer; that country and that Union bequeathed to us by the noblest ancestry of the ages and saved to us by the best blood of their equally noble children.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, amid the many appropriate and graceful tributes to the memory of our departed associate, I ask the privilege of depositing a modest chaplet on the same sacred shrine.

To the interesting biographical sketch, the acute analysis of character, the warm expressions of appreciation and esteem to which the Senate has listened, little need be added. Yet I feel in this connection that something is due from the State which gave him birth, the State toward which his true and loyal heart was ever wont to turn with filial love and never-failing reverence. Though by the exigencies of the times he appeared on this floor as one of the faithful representatives of that fair daughter which had been so rudely carved from the mutilated form of that dismembered State, ALLEN T. CAPERTON was intus et in cute a Virginian of Virginians. His interest and his affections, refusing to be restrained within the narrow confines of West Virginia, included in their loving embrace all Virginia, whether old or new. Nay, sir, I may go farther and say that while Virginia held the first place in his affections, no portion of his country, whether East or West, North or South, was excluded. His expansive patriotism, disdaining the restricted limits of State boundaries, embraced the interests of the whole people.

Reared amid those grand old mountains which, like heaven's sentinels, keep watch and ward around that loved ancestral home where his progenitors for generations had "lived and moved and had their being," it is not surprising that his mind was early imbued with that undying devotion to the principles of liberty and free government which in all ages has been deemed a characteristic of "the dweller among the hills."

Blessed with a fine person, a strong and vigorous intellect improved by culture; of refined literary taste, with an exquisite and quiet humor; of temperate habits and genial disposition, it is not remarkable that he should have been early called to assume the duties and responsibilities of public life. Of that public career, long and honorable as it was, I shall speak very briefly.

By inheritance, as well as by the convictions of his maturer judgment, he was an earnest but not a blind adherent of that grand old party which under the leadership of the "great commoner" attained such enviable distinction for its probity, its purity, and its patriotism as will in all time provoke the emulation of all political organizations; a party which, if not always fortunate in the inauguration of its schemes of statecraft and the election of its candidates, ever maintained as its cardinal doctrine that the interests of the whole country were to be held superior to the gratification of individual ambition, and the prosperity of the people more to be valued than the triumph of the politician.

These principles found in Mr. CAPERTON a steadfast and uncompromising adherent. His intellect, naturally acute, was expanded by culture and disciplined by study in both northern and southern schools until it attained a breadth and comprehensive scope which was fatal alike to the narrow dogmatism of the sectionalist and the destructive frenzy of the fanatic. He was no one-idea man. In politics he knew no higher law than the Constitution of his country, was ambitious of no distinction except that incident to the faithful discharge of representative trust. He sought no selfish end, labored not for personal aggrandizement. His devotion to duty was so absolute and unquestioning, his abnegation of self so utter and complete, that they overshadowed that prudence which ordinarily prompts us to regard personal comfort and personal safety superior to all other considerations, and thus doubtless accelerated the final catastrophe by which an honorable and useful career was so suddenly and sadly closed. Enervated by the excessive heat and exhausted by the unusually arduous and protracted labors of the last session, with vital powers perceptibly waning day by day, he yet, with brave heart and unblenching spirit, refused to seek amid other and more congenial surroundings that repose upon which his very existence depended. In his opinion the interests of his constituents required his personal attention and demanded his continued presence here. The members of the Senate will not, I am sure, soon forget the earnest and almost impassioned tones of his voice as they fell for the last time upon our ears pleading for the inauguration and consummation of such enlarged and comprehensive policy of internal improvements as would develop and enrich not only his own immediate constituency, but would redound to the advantage of the whole country.

In his stern devotion to duty, in his delicate sense of honor, in his contempt for all that was little and mean, and in the fearless bravery of his loyal heart he seemed better suited to the chivalric than to the present utilitarian age. But it was in the domestic circle, amid the sweet endearments of home, that the most lovable and lovely traits of my friend's character found their fullest development. His appreciation of home joys and domestic pleasure was unusually acute, and however appreciated and honored might be his public service, he ever turned with unfailing zest and keen enjoyment to the delights of that mountain home whose elegant hospitalities he so much delighted to dispense, and to that family in whose affectionate ministrations he found his highest happiness. In the sacred penetralia of that home there is "an aching void the world can never fill." I will not with rude hand attempt to draw back the veil which shrouds sorrows which it cannot wholly conceal. To "time, the comforter," and "to Him who doeth all things well," they can look alone for the healing of their yet green wounds, assured that when that time shall come, they will feel a just appreciation of his reputation as a public servant, and will forever cherish as their dearest heritage the memory of his sweet domestic virtues.

Mr. President, to arrest the sweeping current of heated political discussion which has since the commencement of the present session borne down everything before it, to still for a time the tones of mutual denunciation which have so persistently vexed the ear of the Senate; to withdraw our minds for a brief space from the consideration of the exciting questions which press upon us with such engrossing interest, and to turn with saddened hearts and subdued utterances to the performance of the touching duty of paying this tribute of respect and affection to the memory of our departed associate, is eminently judicious and must be productive of good.

These ceremonies bring us face to face with the last great enemy, before whom the struggles of political parties are dwarfed into insignificance, and compel you to remember that "there is no work nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest."

The dreams of ambition, the mad quest for power and place, the aspirations of purest patriotism, alike pass away with the fleeting breath, and thus we "bring our years to an end as a tale that is told:"

> For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not anything. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun.

Such is the conclusion of Him to whom was given wisdom beyond that which has ever fallen to man, and it becomes us well to ponder His words and so apply our hearts to the true wisdom that when our star sets at life's close "it may set as sets the morning star, which goes not down behind the darkened west, but melts away into the brightness of the coming day."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, Mr. CAPERTON took his seat in this body as one of the representatives of West Virginia for the term of six years on the 4th of March, 1875. He died on the 26th of July, 1876.

A law higher than constitutions and a power greater than that of states terminated the high trust his State had committed to him before one-fourth of its period of usefulness and honor had elapsed. The daily lesson of mortality, repeated in every age and every clime in the only language common to all the inhabitants of the earth, speaks as clearly to those in the most exalted as to those in the humblest stations. The cabinets and audience-chambers of kings and the halls of senates are as obedient to its inexorable voice as the lonely tent or wigwam of the poorest dweller in the desert. Misery and happiness, want and affluence, are equal before it; and so day by day there disappear from the scene of human endeavor as well the actors of the great parts as the simple figures who only pass unnoticed across the shadows of the most distant parts of the stage.

In the brief career of Mr. CAPERTON among us, he had endeared himself to the whole body of his senatorial associates. Political friends and political opponents alike found in him those qualities of personal uprightness and independence that do so much always to mitigate the overzeal and soften the asperities of party strife. A man of much sensitiveness of temper and of strong opinions, the self-reverence and self-control flowing from a gentle spirit, a cultivated intellect, and long intercourse with his fellow-men in many stations of trust made him always courteous in manner and conciliatory in advancing his own opinions and in opposing those of others. He has been suddenly taken from the sphere of labor for his State and his country, upon which he had but just commenced. As we join in the sorrows of the young Commonwealth he represented, we naturally look backward to his predecessors and to her singular history. Mr. CAPERTON was only the third Senator of his class from that State. Mr. Boreman immediately preceded him, and Mr. Van Winkle preceded Mr. Boreman, and was one of the first two Senators from West Virginia, Mr. Willey being his colleague. Out of the convulsions of the rebellion there was born a new and welcome sister in our great family of States.

The substantial power of the old Commonwealth of Virginia, glorious in all her previous history—east of the mountains having carried her in 1861 into the rebellion—although during a short period afterward she had representatives in the Senate—the people of the forty-eight counties of the western part of the State, lying among the beautiful and fertile valleys of the Alleghanies, in 1862 framed a constitution and government for a separate and independent State. The great majority of this people were loyal to the national unity of the Republic, and naturally felt deeply anxious that their fortunes should not be linked with those of Eastern Virginia in its sad attempt to break up the Government of the Union. After much consideration and many doubts, on the 31st of December, 1862, an act of Congress was passed providing for the creation of the new State of West Virginia, and on the 19th of June, 1863, she became the thirty-fifth State of the Union, and the twenty-second of the new States. The character of the political body that, as the Legislature of Virginia, assented to the dismemberment of the State was not the clearest, as being the constitutional Legislature of the old State; but Congress exercised its undoubted political power to recognize it as such, and the State of West Virginia became an accomplished and unchangeable fact. It is not one of the least evils flowing from powerful assaults upon lawful government that the government itself is often forced to extreme measures and to the verge of its authority to preserve and protect itself; and thus it sometimes transmits to later times unsatisfactory precedents and examples that many in less emergencies are too apt to resort to as the justification or excuse for other steps dangerous to the common weal. As we reflect upon the characters and careers of departed statesmen and bring up to view the events with which they were connected in times of trouble and distress, can we not repeat with fervent emphasis?

> Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day,
> Live till to-morrow, will have passed away.

Neither the purest motives nor the most exalted patriotism can prove an antidote to the poison of measures of any government beyond its constituted power, however apt they may be for the exigencies of an existing occasion, or for an appeal to any other force than that of the law for the redress of grievances arising in a government constituted upon principles of justice and equal rights, and wherein, from period to period, recourse must be had to fresh expressions of the popular will. The men of the time and the excitement of the hour pass away, but the institutions and the body of the people, old and yet ever new, remain to rectify, in the sober light of truth and reason, the evils that ignorance or passion, prejudice or corruption, may have inflicted upon society.

To-day we make memorial to a prominent figure in the government of a great nation. One of that very small body of men, to whom, as "the sheet-anchor of the Government," the security and happiness of more than forty millions of people are chiefly committed, has been called, suddenly and forever, from his place. Such an event, although certain to occur very often, cannot fail to be solemn and impressive, not only—indeed not chiefly—from our awe of death, or from our friendship and respect for the man who has gone, but from considerations that relate to the connection of particular individuals, or indeed selected bodies of men, with affairs of state, and the little contribution the most fortunate are actually able to make to the sum of human events.

In this body itself, the most permanent in its personality of any under the Constitution except the judiciary, a very few years suffice to change almost entirely the elements of its composition. There now remain to us only three Senators who occupied their places at the beginning of Mr. Lincoln's administration, or who participated officially in the long tragedy of the rebellion; and there are only eleven who in 1868 were members of the high court that tried and acquitted the President. The accused and the greater part of his judges have long since left the forum—some for the simple duties and pleasures of citizenship, and some, with the chief personage in that great drama, have gone to their long repose, and to whose constantly increasing number has now been added one of the most recently appointed of the members of this body.

Surely the works we personally do for our country must be few and small in the aggregate of history, and their permanent value must depend, not upon the glamor of oratory, the polish of scholarship, or skill in discussion, but rather on that deep spirit of truth and justice, and the courage to follow them always, that make up the character of him—

> Who, whether praise of him must walk the earth
> Forever, and to noble deeds give birth,
> Or must go to dust without his fame,
> And leave a dead, unprofitable name,
> Finds comfort in himself and in his cause,
> And, while the mortal mist is gathering, draws
> His breath in confidence of Heaven's applause.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, on the 4th of March, 1875, our lamented associate ALLEN TAYLOR CAPERTON took his seat in this body, having been elected to serve until March, 1881. Death closed his career when but little more than a single year of his senatorial service had been performed. During this short period there was little to signalize his service here, and in the quiet, steady, undemonstrative performance of his duty must be found the basis of any commentary we may now make.

I have said his period of service here was short, yet it was long enough to cause all who came to be acquainted with him to mourn that it should not have been longer. It was long enough to impress those whose acquaintance he then first made with respect and confidence.

He came into this body with a high and unblemished personal repute, not built upon noisy professions and sustained by sensational advertisement, but firmly founded in the appreciation of his personal qualities by his friends, his neighbors, and that wide-spread circle of men of all shades of political opinion in Virginia and West Virginia amid whom his modest and virtuous life had been spent and where a worthy ancestry had preceded him from the first foundations of civil government in that country.

The term declared by the psalmist to be the years of a man had been nearly passed by him, for he had reached his sixty-seventh year when the "dread arrest" was felt. But he had so lived that he did not fear to die, and although wrung with pain he met it as the immediate and recognized precursor of death, with that fortitude which had characterized his whole life. He had lived remote from cities, and in the comparative seclusion of a country life had found his theater of usefulness, duty, and quiet happiness.

From the most venerable and one of the most highly respected institutions of learning in our country he had received, in 1832, his diploma of scholarship, and as a graduate of Yale College entered upon the study and soon the practice of the law. He attained high standing in the ranks of his profession, and gained and kept the confidence and affection of those around him, as was attested by the many important public trusts he was called upon to execute.

When Virginia, his native home, felt in 1861, in common with all other members of our Federal Union, the terrible convulsions of political strife, it was almost inevitable that a citizen so eminent and esteemed by men of all parties as Mr. CAPERTON should be called upon in that critical hour to represent his people in the public counsels.

While he sought not distinction for himself, he shrank not from responsibility, nor kept in the background when danger showed itself at the front, for no man in a land where courage is the rule was more constant in that quality, morally and physically, than he.

He was in politics a whig—a conservative Union man—and with such views became a member of the State convention of Virginia of 1861. This is not the occasion to relate nor I the fit historian of the longing, lingering look, cast back upon that Union, in so great degree the work of her sons in field and council, of her treasure and her territory, by the great State of Virginia as she reluctantly withdrew from its political association.

The conscience and training of ALLEN CAPERTON bade him follow the political fortunes of his State, and in obedience to the call of her Legislature he became a member of the Confederate States senate in 1862, and served there throughout its stormy existence and until the end of that short-lived government. Ten years after that government had passed away, to be known no more except in history, Mr. CAPERTON was in the vicissitude of human affairs chosen to represent the State of West Virginia in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I have never felt more penetrated with a sense of the wisdom of prompt and thorough reconciliation of our fellow-countrymen, so lately and violently at strife, than when I recognized in the course of my confidential relations of private friendship with ALLEN CAPERTON how truly and wholly his heart beat for the happiness and prosperity of our whole country, and for the perpetuation of its constitutional government. Would that now the power could be given to me to picture in all its glowing and truthful reality the fidelity of his honest soul, that has so lately taken its flight, to the integrity and welfare of our Government and the happiness of all its people.

Sure am I that distrust and suspicion toward men such as he, and from the section of country with which he was politically identified, would vanish, and forever, from the breasts of their fellow-countrymen of the more northern section of the Union.

Honor and truth are not mere idle abstractions. They are the living and practical realities upon which men and women found their best reliance for personal happiness, and which constitute the real bulwarks of a nation's welfare and safety, without which written constitutions are mockeries and laws mere pitfalls.

In the life of the modest gentleman whose death we mourn these qualities were constantly exemplified, and from our contemplation of them and their exercise may we not take new resolve to pay them due respect in our memory of the dead, and call for their recognition and practice in our intercourse with the living.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, we have paused in our daily labor, turned aside from the routine of business and from the consideration of those grave questions which disturb the public mind with vague alarm, to pay tribute of respect to one who in his brief service in this body, by his kindness, courtesy, and frankness, made each of us his friend, and who discharged his public duties with industry, intelligence, fidelity, and honor.

This Chamber is the arena of intellectual combat, and when the great monarch drops his baton the conflict of opinion is suspended.

In all stations, in every allotment of life, it is well that we should sometimes be brought to the absolute contemplation of death, and the realization that to each of us it is inevitable and near. The days of our life are numbered; at each sunset there is one less. The sands of our life are measured. While I speak they are wasting.

Though death is as "common as any, the most vulgar thing to sense," though it hath been "cried from the first corse till he that died to-day 'this must be so,'" it still remains the great mystery whose overshadowing presence awes us into a sense of our insignificance, and shows us the objects of our pursuit and passionate desire in their cold, naked reality. And this is its office to the living. Not lips touched with the fire of genius can so solemnize us to a sense of duty, so plead for the right, so admonish us of the vanity of human expectation as the dumb, cold lips of the dead. Beneath these forms and trappings, beneath this covering of flesh, our skeletons are marching to the grave. And everything on earth that we long for, seek, strive for, is but a covered skeleton. Adorn it as we may, cheat ourselves as we will, "to this complexion it must come at last;" and then dust and ashes.

SIX months ago, if ALLEN TAYLOR CAPERTON had entered this Chamber and passed to his seat, it would have been a commonplace incident, as little noted as your or my coming to-day. If he should enter that door now, what an awe would fall upon us all. If he should rise at his desk to speak, with what rapt suspense we should listen. Not the most eloquent words that ever fell from mortal lips could so enchain attention as the lightest syllable from his.

Yet if he could come back from the "undiscovered country" and speak to us as in the flesh, do we not know what his message would be? Would he not counsel peace and good-will? Could he inculcate a higher lesson than that taught of old, that "righteousness exalteth a nation;" that "error shall pass away like a shadow, the truth shall endure forever?" Could he not tell us that self-seeking is not the highest wisdom, that safe guidance is not found in passion; and that institutions can neither be built nor preserved by hatred or violence? Could he reveal a diviner precept than "love," a more sacred duty than "charity?" If it has been permitted him to pass in review the procession of events in the unnumbered ages since man appeared on the earth and to realize that history has but begun, that in the curtained future there are countless ages to be, could he not tell us that in the grand sweep of destiny mere personal success, the pride of place, the lust of power, are of as little worth as the foam on the river?

This is the message from the dead past to the living present; this is the lesson of the silent centuries; this is the voice from the grave of all who have gone before.

Those who knew Senator CAPERTON better than I have already spoken of the traits of his character and the incidents of his life. In our brief acquaintance he impressed me as a man of culture and refinement; of strong practical sense, impatient with what he regarded as abstractions, zealous for the promotion of every material interest, and devoted to a reunion of hearts and hands through all the land. His neighbors told me he was a man of active habits, interested in every enterprise for the advancement and improvement of the country where he lived, strong in his convictions, outspoken in his opinions, steadfast in his friendship, and of bountiful hospitality.

He had this true test of genuine worth—his character and temper softened and mellowed with years and experience. Children loved him, and the dumb beast regarded him as a natural protector.

He lived, where his ancestors had for several generations, in a region of great beauty of landscape—a high plateau with mountain-peaks in the distance, with intervales and opening vistas of surpassing loveliness—off the great lines of travel, and where the stream of life seemed to eddy into a quiet circle. It was a spot where old customs survive, old fashions prevail, and old faiths are cherished. From his beautiful home, through the broad English lawn—almost a park—we bore his remains to the village church, where his old friends and neighbors had gathered from all the country round. The solemn service for the dead was spoken. We followed him to the grave-yard on the hill and left him with his fathers.

His task is finished. He has no part or lot in all that is done beneath the sun. No more for him the voice of love, the song of gladness, the load of care, the cup of sorrow. Not for him the beauty of spring, the splendor of summer, the glory of autumn, the uncrowned majesty of winter. Flowers will spring from his grave; storms will beat upon it; morning will greet it with her earliest light, night crown it with her stars, and the earth, rolling in her great orb in infinite space, will bear his dust with hers, till time shall be no more.

Ah, mystery of death, and greater mystery of life; both are in the hand of Him without whose knowledge not a sparrow falls; obedient to whose will the tides of human destiny ebb and flow, and unto whom a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is gone, or a watch in the night.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. President, I was no doubt better acquainted with the deceased than was any other Senator here. We lived in adjoining counties, practiced law in the same courts, were members of the same Legislatures and the same conventions, and generally had the same interests to represent. Our acquaintance extended back to his early manhood, when he first commenced his professional and entered upon his public career.

He was the son of Hugh Caperton, esq., a gentleman of fascinating address and popular manners, of great compass and energy of mind, and who, by his energy and sound judgment, had amassed a large fortune, which he left unimpaired and unembarrassed to his children. He was repeatedly called on by the citizens of his county to represent them in the popular branch of the State Legislature; and he always served them to their entire satisfaction. He was also elected to Congress from his district at a critical period in our history and rendered service satisfactory to his district.

ALLEN TAYLOR CAPERTON, the subject of our remarks to-day, was born on the 21st day of November, 1810, in the town of Union, Monroe County, Virginia, now West Virginia, and departed this life on the 26th day of July, 1876. He inherited his father's popularity and a large estate. He received the rudiments of an English education at the village school of his native town. At that time there being no schools of a high grade in that immediate neighborhood, he was sent to the academy at Huntsville, Alabama, where he remained two and a half years. He was then sent to the Lewisburgh Academy, which was presided over by that historic character Rev. Dr. John McElhenny, the pioneer preacher in the Presbyterian Church, a veneration for whose person and character Mr. CAPERTON cherished during the remainder of his life.

In early manhood, (the date I have not obtained,) Mr. CAPERTON became a student at Yale College, where he remained four years and until he was graduated. Upon his return to Virginia he went to the university of that State, where he was also graduated. He finally finished his education at General (afterward Judge) Baldwin's law school in Staunton, Virginia, and immediately thereafter commenced the practice of his profession.

He was married in the twenty-second year of his age to Miss Harriet Echols, a lady of great intellectual, social, and moral worth, whose acquaintance he made while a student at Yale College, and who remains his survivor.

Mr. CAPERTON filled many offices of trust and importance.

The first office that he filled was a State directorship in the James River and Kanawha Company as successor to his father, who had held that office and resigned. This, though not a lucrative office, having neither salary nor perquisites, was deemed one of great State importance, as it was then expected that by this improvement the waters of the Chesapeake would be connected with the waters of the Mississippi through the State of Virginia.

In April, 1841, he became a candidate for the State Legislature, and was elected to represent his native county in the house of delegates.

In April, 1844, he was elected to the State senate from the counties of Monroe, Giles, Montgomery, Floyd, Greenbrier, and Mercer. During this term, which was one of four years, he had the misfortune to lose his venerated father. He filled no political or civil office from that time until 1850. He was the executor of his father's will, which devolved upon him a large mass of business which, with a large and increasing professional business, gave him full employment without being involved in the mazes of politics.

In August, 1850, a convention being called to amend the State constitution, his fellow-citizens of Monroe, Giles, Tazewell, and Mercer Counties called on him to become one of their representatives, to which call he responded affirmatively and was elected. In this convention he took a prominent part, the great question before that body being the basis of representation in the two houses of the Legislature, one party assuming that white population should be the basis, the other that population and taxation combined should be the basis. He, in common with his western friends, advocated the white basis. The question was finally settled by a committee of compromise of which he was a member.

He was twice upon the whig electoral ticket as elector, but failed to secure his election because his party was in the minority in the State at both elections.

In 1859 he was induced to become again a candidate for the house of delegates, with a view of pushing on the great central improvement which is now known as the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. He was elected and served two sessions. It would scarcely be necessary for me to say that he was one of the leading members of that body, if not the very leader.

While he was thus serving in the house of delegates, he, in 1861, was elected a delegate to the State convention known as the secession convention. He entered that convention with a determination to save the Union if he could; but when President Lincoln called for money and troops to subjugate the South, he did not think the Union could be preserved, and voted for the separation.

In 1862, Hon. William Ballard Preston, one of the senators in the confederate congress having departed this life, Mr. CAPERTON was elected to fill the vacancy.

In 1875 he was elected by the Legislature of West Virginia a Senator in this body, which he remained to the time of his death.

This is his public history, the principal part of which is known to your humble speaker.

I said in the outset that he inherited his father's popularity and a large estate, which assertion I again repeat with the addition that he added greatly to both. By the rehearsal which I have given of the chronology of his public life, it will be seen that his popularity grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength; that his last days were his most popular days; and he added to his fortune as well as to his popularity, and died possessed of a large estate.

As a lawyer he was always ingenious and persuasive. He understood law as a science, and practiced with great success. He was generally engaged in all the important cases that arose within the range of his practice. He generally argued his cases with marked ability, though he was not always equal to himself. He required to be aroused; without that his utterance was a little hesitating, and his mind seemed timid in taking hold of the subject; but when thoroughly aroused his language flowed copiously and his mind worked smoothly and vigorously. He could not only follow up his subject in argument, but could add beauty to strength; he could cull flowers for the jury and carry on a playful dalliance with everything he met with on the wayside. He was probably the best lawyer I ever knew who did not commence the practice of law from necessity, poverty being as a general thing necessary, as I think, to professional success. I can unite with another friend of his who said just before the senatorial election in 1875, "Mr. CAPERTON is an accomplished man in every respect." His disposition was genial and his fund of information copious, which made him attractive as a social companion.

His last illness was short. No one thought the symptoms of his case were alarming. Some of his family were with him, not as watchmen at the bed of death, but as nurses around the bed of sickness. He was bolstered up in bed with pillows and said to his children who were present, "Hoist the window; hoist it quickly," and swooned away and died. The winged messenger was sped with too fatal an aim. Death had struck its victim, and he is no more. "He is gone from us and will not come to us, but we may go to him."

"The ways of Providence are inscrutable and past finding out." But this we know, that "it is appointed unto men once to die." He has gone before us. We must soon follow.

To say that he was an affectionate husband and a kind father would be commonplace and almost a mockery in terms, for his family not only reverenced him but almost adored him. They have sustained the "irreparable loss," and no one can realize the deep meaning of this expression who has never experienced it. We need not go into the sanctuary of the family to find mourners; they are found in the streets, in the by-ways and the hedges, and everywhere where Mr. CAPERTON was known.

Deeply sympathizing with his family and other friends in humble sorrow we submit to the fiat of an all-wise and inscrutable Providence.

Mr. President, as a further testimonial of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to unanimously; and (at four o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

W. N. HALDEMAN.

Mr. MILLIKEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4263) for the relief of W. N. Haldeman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

R. D. SALMANS AND OTHERS.

Mr. MILLIKEN, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4264) for the relief of R. D. Salmans and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the bills from the Senate now on the Speaker's table may be taken therefrom, simply for reference, that they may be put in possession of the committees before the holidays.

The SPEAKER. The motion would be in order after the morning hour; but the gentleman from Iowa may ask unanimous consent that the motion may be entertained at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that after the morning hour all the business on the Speaker's table may be disposed of, so as to be properly referred before the holiday recess.

Mr. KASSON. If it is preferred, I will postpone the motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the morning hour.

ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY DURING PEACE.

Mr. WILLIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4264) providing for the organization of the Navy during peace; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AND POST-OFFICE AT HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4265) making appropriations for continuing the construction of the custom-house and post-office at Hartford, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4266) to amend section 2325 of the Revised Statutes relating to the development of the mining resources of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH B. C. HARE.

Mr. O'NEILL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4267) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Binney Cadwallader Hare, widow of George H. Hare, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

OSCAR B. KNOTT.

Mr. VAN VORHES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4268) granting a pension to Oscar B. Knott, late a private in Company K, One hundred and sixty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill authorizing the issue of certain funds now in the Treasury belonging to the Osage Indians, for the benefit of said Indians, and am instructed by the committee to move that the bill be now put upon its passage. If the House will allow me I desire briefly to explain the object of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina. [MR. SCALES,] reserving the right of gentlemen to object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue a sum not exceeding $50,000 from funds now in the Treasury belonging to the Osage Indians under an act of July 15, 1870, to be expended for their benefit, to aid them in agriculture, for their care and support, and in extending improvements already begun on their reservation, and in any other manner to promote their civilization and improvement.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to make a brief statement. The bill is based upon a report made by the agent who has charge of those Indians. It comes from Superintendent Nicholson, who, I think, is one of the best and most faithful superintendents we have in the whole service. It is recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and reported favorably by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The bill only provides that the Osage Indians, who are perhaps the richest tribe of Indians we have in this country, shall be permitted to use $50,000 of their own funds now in the Treasury. According to a report made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs they have now in the hands of the Treasurer nearly one and a half millions of dollars. They are in a destitute condition. They need this money badly. These are the representations made to us; and this simply provides that these Indians be allowed the use of $50,000 of the fund which belongs to them, and which is now in the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reception of the bill?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does it come from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir; it is a report from that committee.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4272) was received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again read. And I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that the act of 1870, to which reference is made in the bill, be also read.

Mr. SCALES. It was by the act of 1870 that these lands were sold and the proceeds put into the Treasury. This is the interest on that money. They are in need of it. They did not get it last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. This only applies to the interest on the fund?

Mr. SCALES. This $50,000 will not take the whole interest.

The bill was again read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED LAND TITLES.

Mr. KIDDER, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2114) to give parties contestant time to file on or enter lands under the pre-emption, homestead, or timber-culture acts after the contests shall have been finally decided; which was ordered to be printed and re-committed, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4269) to amend section 3880 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4270) to amend section 2002, and to repeal sections 1980, 5220, and 5528 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MARY E. CAMPBELL.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions a bill (H. R. No. 1985) granting a pension to Mary E. Campbell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. & W. H. LEWIS.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4271) authorizing William Lewis and William H. Lewis to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of their patent for new and useful photographic-plate-holders; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE.

Mr. HATCHER, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the governors of Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, and others, for action on the part of Congress in reference to the grasshopper plague; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TAMPERING WITH THE MAILS.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas ABRAM S. HEWITT, a member of this House, has asserted on this floor in public speech that his letters, passing through the post-office at the city of New York, have been illegally opened before delivery and while in charge of the postal officers or employés of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed to investigate said charge, and whether the same be true or false, and by whom, if by any person, said criminal act or acts were committed, and report thereon to this House as early as practicable; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] ought to provide in this resolution that the committee shall have leave to report at any time.

Mr. PLATT. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the resolution will be again reported.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late. The Speaker asked whether there was objection, and made the usual hesitation before announcing that there was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this inquiry might be made by the Postmaster-General. I suggest the propriety of so modifying the resolution as to instruct the Postmaster-General to make the inquiry.

Mr. PLATT. I claim that I have the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has the floor.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to submit a telegram from the postmaster at New York City.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, December 30, 1876.

Hon. THOMAS C. PLATT, House of Representatives, Washington:

The Times and Herald have called my attention to remarks said to have been made by Mr. HEWITT gravely affecting this office. I have just telegraphed Mr. HEWITT as follows:

"I am informed that you charge on the floor of Congress that your letters passing through this office are or have been opened before reaching your hands. Do you charge that it is or has been actually or probably done in this office? If so, please supplement your charge with a motion for immediate investigation, as I pronounce such an accusation utterly and absolutely false."

T. L. JAMES.

Mr. PLATT. I move the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow the resolution to be again read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the resolution will be left open for amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not sustained, of course the resolution will be open to amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask that the resolution be again read. I was unfortunately not in my seat when it was presented.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I rise to what I suppose is a point of order. The preamble of this resolution alleges that I made certain statements which I did not make. The RECORD shows the statement that I made; and if the gentleman wishes to have this resolution adopted, I think he will do better to quote the language which I used, and not put into my mouth words which I did not use.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that that is hardly a point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it a question of privilege?

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman who introduced the resolution to withdraw his call for the previous question.

Mr. PLATT. I am willing to modify the preamble of the resolution so as to make it conform to the language which the gentleman used on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that if one member misstates the language of another, the member so aggrieved has a right to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege, and desire to correct the language used in the preamble.

Mr. PLATT. I will consent to the correction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] proposes to change the language of the preamble. He will please come forward to the Clerk's desk and do so.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask that the Clerk shall read from the RECORD the language which I used on yesterday.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] will withdraw his call for the previous question, and allow his colleague [Mr. HEWITT] to make a statement.

Mr. PLATT. I will withdraw the call for the previous question and yield to my colleague. [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now that this resolution has been introduced and is before the House it is proper for me to make a statement of the facts which gave rise to the remarks which I uttered yesterday. About a month ago, as near as I can now recollect, immediately after the close of the presidential election, that is, just after the 7th of November, I received a letter without signature stating that the writer was an employé of the New York post-office and that he felt bound to communicate to me the fact, to use the language of the letter, that "Slade's little tea-kettle" was at work upon my letters. The letter being without signature, the only attention that I felt called upon to pay to it was to observe the appearance of my letters from that time. I did observe them, and I found that a considerable number of them presented, so far as I could judge and as others thought, the appearance of having been opened, and the flap of the envelope presented a puckered or corrugated appearance. I called the attention of gentlemen in my office to this fact, and they were able to pick out two classes of letters, those which had apparently been opened and those which had not been opened.
